"I don't mind tellin' ye how I larned to smoke, though seein' you've got the hang of it now 'twon't larn ye nothin'," said an old sailor. "You see, I shipped first off in the Two Jennies, a neat bark in the Manilla trade outen Boston. Old Capt. Strong was a powerful man for discipline, and when he catched one of us youngsters nappin' he'd lambast us sartin. Ever been to sea? In course not. I know'd it, but thought I'd be perlite and ask ye, so you wouldn't think I tuk you for a greeny. I reckon if ye had you'd know that the wind watch was just what kerflumixed the boys every time. Keep awake? It's simply impossible. I'd tumble up on deck fast enough when the watch was called, and 'ud take my place on lookout as chipper as a Water street canary, but in about fifteen minutes, lord! I wasn't seasick no more, the rollin' of the Two Jennies was just like rock me to sleep, mother, in a cradle, with the creakin' of the blocks to make me think of the way my Aunt Mariar used to sing me to sleep when I was a kid. I know'd the old man 'ud catch me if I slept three winks, and that he'd lam me with the flying jib downhaul, but go to sleep I must.

"Fust off I tried walkin' like I seen old sailors, but 'twan't no use; then I'd bite my tongue and chew rope yarn. No go. Then I got a pin offen one of the sailors, and when I'd find myself noddin' too far I'd jab it into my leg. I wa'n't but 15 years old and that 'ere couldn't last, but what to do I didn't know. In course this all what I'm tellin' you didn't happen all to wunst; it jest kep comin' on harder 'n harder every night what I had to turn out at eight bells. At last the old man catched me. I was standin' up square in the middle of the t'gallant fo'c'sl the last I knew, and the next thing I was all in a heap whar I'd been standin' and the old man a stingin' me with the end o' the flyin' jib downhaul. I didn't go to sleep no more that watch, but the next time I had lookout I was jest as bad off as ever. Then I thought about water. I says I'll fix it, and I a'most did. I just got a bucket and histed in a bucketful of brine. Then I plunged my head into that, and, believe it or not, I went fast to sleep with my face under water. It felt that cool and good that I jest went right off. In course I was drowndin' hand over fist, but the second mate come along and hauls me out and fetches me to. Then he says: 'Sonny, I'll tell you what you do, and you won't go to sleep no more. Just sneak down for'd and borrow a pipe and terbacker from one o' the men what's asleep and can't help theirselves,' which I did it to wunst.

"Yah, the way the first whiff sarved me turns my stummick when I thinks of it now. I hadn't never smoked before, though I'd been livin' in a fo'c'sl where you'd thought there wasn't no air but smoke. Well, that 'ere sickness cured me of wantin' to sleep for about half an hour. When I began to feel easy in my stummick I was came back and I pinted for the lamp and lit the pipe, so more sickness come, and through the watch, and a watches. It was pretty boys has got to take thin they goes to sea. I was nineteen days gettin' back from Manilla, and by that to like the pipe and keep watch, too. I reckon I've forty boys to smoke that then."

The following story [illegible] "Listener" from a Maine [illegible] strikes him that, for on[illegible] break, in its behalf, the ol[illegible] to call a story a good one [illegible] told:

One evening, not long ag[illegible] arrested a gentleman of [illegible] of cheery habits. The po[illegible] he had found the old g[illegible] the street very drunk. The policeman had given his testimony, which was unqualified to the fact of the old gentleman's intoxication. Then the old servant was called to the stand. There was a mingled expression of indignation and determination on his countenance. He testified flatly, to the surprise of the court-room, that the old man was sober when he came home. The Prosecuting Attorney proceeded to to question.

"You say that Mr. —— was sober when he came home?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did he go to bed alone?"

"No, sir."

"Did you put him to bed?"

"Yes, sir."

"And he was perfectly sober?"

"Yes, sir."

"What did he say when you put him to bed?"

"He said 'Good night.'"

"Anything else?"

"He said as how I was to call him early."

"Anything else?"

"Yes, sir."

"What was it? Tell us exactly what he said, every word."

"He said as how I was to wake and call him early, for he was to be Queen of the May."

The court room roared. And in spite of the old servant's very positive testimony the accused was convicted and fined.—Boston Transcript.

The Living Inhabitants of Caverns.

The living inhabitants of caverns, those which make these regions of continuous darkness their abiding-places, are numerous and of the greatest interest to the naturalist. Of the several hundred species known to students, by far the greater part belong to the group of articulated animals, insects, and crustaceans, these being the forms which, of all animals, are the most varied in structure and best suited for the odd chances of life which the caverns afford. As the reader well knows, the great problem now before science is to determine how far the shapes of living creatures are determined by the circumstances of the world about them, and how far this determination has been brought about through a process of selection in a natural way, of those varieties which have some accidental special fitness for the conditions in which they live. Cavern-animals afford us a capital bit of evidence toward the solution of this problem. The prevailing close affinity of their forms with those which live in the upper world of sunshine and changing seasons shows, beyond a question, that they are all derived from similar forms which once dwelt in the ordinary conditions of animal life. What, then, are the effects arising from this complete change in the circumstances of these underground creatures?

The facts are perplexing in their variety, and by no means well worked out, but the following points seem to be well established, viz.: There is a manifest tendency of all gayly-colored forms to lose their hues in the caverns, and to become of an even color. This may be explained by the simple absence of sunshine, and on it no conclusions can be based. The changes of structural parts are of more importance; these, as might be expected, relate mainly to the organs of sense. The eyes show an evident tendency in all the groups to fade away. In the characteristic cavern-fishes they have entirely disappeared, the whole structure which serves for vision being no longer produced. In the cray-fishes we may observe a certain gradation. Some species which abound in caverns are provided with eyes; others have them present, but so imperfect that they cannot serve as visual organs; yet others want them altogether. One species of pseudo-scorpion, as shown by Prof. Hagan, has in the outer world four eyes, while in the caves it has been found with two eyes, and others in an entirely eyeless condition. Some cavern-beetles have the males with eyes, while the females are quite without them. As a whole, the cavern-forms exhibit a singular tendency of the visual organs, not only to lose their functions, but also to disappear as body-parts. At the same time there is an equal, or even more general, development of the antennæ and other organs of touch; these parts become considerably lengthened, and apparently of greater sensitiveness, a change which is of manifest advantage to the individual.—N. S. Shaler, in Scribner's Magazine.

Queer Antipathies.

It seems absolutely incredible that Peter the Great, the father of the Russian navy, should shudder at the sight of water, whether running or still, yet so it was, especially when alone. His palace gardens, beautiful as they were, he never entered, because the river Mosera flowed through them. His coachman had orders to avoid all roads which led past streams, and if compelled to cross a brook or bridge, the great Emperor would sit with closed windows, in a cold perspiration. Another monarch, James I., the English Solomon, as he liked to be called, had many antipathies, chiefly tobacco, ling, and pork. He never overcame his inability to look with composure at a drawn sword; and it is said that on one occasion, when giving the accolade, the King turned his face aside, nearly wounding the new-made knight. Henry III., of France, had so great a dislike to cats that he fainted at the sight of one. We suppose that in this case the cat had to waive its proverbial prerogative and could not look at a king. This will seem as absurd as extraordinary to lady lovers of that much-petted animal, but what are we to say of the Countess of Lamballe, of unhappy history, to whom a violet was a thing of horror? Even this is not without its precedent, for it is on record that Vincent, the painter, was seized with vertigo and swooned at the smell of roses. Scaliger states that one of his relations was made ill at the sight of a lily, and he himself would turn pale at the sight of water-cresses and could never drink milk.

Charles Kingsley, naturalist as he was to the core, had a great horror of spiders; and in "Glaucus," after saying that every one seems to have his antipathetic animal, continues: "I know one (himself) bred from childhood to zoology by land and sea, and bold in asserting and honest in feeling that all without exception is beautiful, who yet cannot, after handling and petting and examining, all the day long, every uncouth and venomous beast, avoid a paroxysm of horror at the sight of the common house-spider."

Dreaming of His Father's Death.

Not long ago a young son of Capt. Cutton, the master of the ship Muskoka, dreamed of a terrible storm at sea. In his dream he saw the sky hidden by dense black masses of clouds through which darted gleaming shafts of lightning. The waters of the deep were tossed to and fro by the tempest, their foam-covered crests rising almost to the heavens. In the midst of the awful scene was his father's ship, gallantly struggling with the storm, and great seas washing over her from stem to stern. While he gazed in his dream one sea more furious than the rest swept across the vessel and carried in its embrace the form of his father. He watched him until he saw him disappear beneath the surges, and then in an agony of fright he screamed and awoke. Everything seemed so terribly realistic that the youth woke his mother and told her of his terrible vision. She fears that it will only prove too true. The Muskoka is missing and given up as lost.—St. John (N. B.) Globe.

"Let the water boil, Matilda," replied Mrs. Bigman, calmly; "the longer it boils the stronger it will be."—Harper's Magazine.

Coquetry and Prudery.

A coquet seeks to fascinate for the sake of fascinating. Like a miser, she mistakes the means of the end, and feeds on one sided passion and admiration, until one morning she wakes up and finds her beauty gone, and herself the most disappointed and unamiable of old maids. Or, again, she might be compared to a bank clerk who refused his salary because he was satisfied with the tinkling of the money which he heard all day long. The flirt, on the other hand, displays her accomplishments, her wit, and personal charms for the sake of enlarging her facilities of courtship, the possibilities of rational choice.

Flirtation, from the feminine point of view, may be defined as the art of fascinating a man and leaving him in doubt as to whether he is loved or not. With refined men of the period flirting, i. e., fascinating and leaving in doubt, is quite as effective in kindling adoration to ecstasy as crude coyness was with the coarse-fibred men of the past. Flirtation, indeed, is much more tantalizing than coyness, and therefore a complete modern substitute for it.

To sum up the matter in one sentence: The coy prude says no, even when she means yes; the cold coquette says yes and always means no; the modern and refined flirt says neither yes nor no, but looks and smiles a sweet, "Perhaps—if you can win my love."—Finck's Book on "Love and Beauty."

The Squat and Swarthy Italians.

One who has watched them and studied their ways says that the Italian laborers on the railroads in this country live principally on rye bread, macaroni, and pork. They earn $1.20 per day, and as they never lose any time they get from $30 to $35 per month. From this the board bill is deducted. Their expenses, for the month generally run between $5 and $6. Some live on less, but when a man spends $7 or $8 per month he is considered as living very extravagantly. They come from the northern part of Italy, from the region near the Alps. Very few of them come from any part of Italy south of Rome, for in that part of the country there is a great deal of tilling of soil, a great many vineyards, and a great deal of work. The poorer classes of Italians are to be found in the northern part of Italy, where work is scarce and where the men are always ready to come to this country. This is pretty severe competition with American workingmen, especially when the latter own property, pay taxes, and give their children an education.—Boston Traveler.

REMINISCENCES OF PUBLIC MEN.

BY BEN: PERLEY POORE.

Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, had a negro man named Henry, who was very fond of 'possum hunting—a perfect Nimrod in that line. Having, as usual, gone out for that purpose, it was not long before his dogs struck a track and soon treed. The hunter, having arrived at the tree, deliberately laid down his torch, and drawing his ax from his shoulder, eager for the game, began laying on to fell it. He had not given more than one or two cuts, when, to his consternation, he heard a voice from above, saying: "If you won't let the dogs bite me, I'll come down and help you cut the tree down." Thunderstruck and amazed, the huntsman dropped his ax, and made double-quick time for home. It turned out in the sequel that another negro, a runaway, hearing the dogs, took to a tree, and the possum was treed in another about ten feet off; the runaway seeing no other person but the hunter come up, volunteered his services to help him. But Nimrod thought the "varmint" was entirely too obliging, or "thar was a ghost somewhar about."

Abraham Lincoln was on one occasion trying a case in Sangamon County, Illinois, against a very able lawyer, who made such a convincing speech to the jury that Mr. Lincoln saw that it had produced an impression. The gentleman was not only precise in his oratory but in his dress, and Mr. Lincoln saw a flaw in his usually faultless attire. "Gentlemen of the jury," said "Old Abe," when he arose to speak, "the gentleman who has just spoken has made a strong argument. He has quoted the law and evidence, and it is not for me to say that he is wrong. He may be correct in all that he has said. But I want you to take a good look at him. Look especially at the upper half, and then, gentlemen, tell me if any man who comes before you with his standing collar buttoned 'wrong end to,' with the points sticking away out behind the ears, may not be altogether mistaken in his arguments." The plan was successful. Mr. Lincoln had broken the spell which the eloquence of his opponent had thrown over the jury.

Ben Hill created a sensation at Washington when he admitted that forty-two ex-Confederates pledged themselves to each other several weeks before the Wormley conference to see that the count for President was legally concluded, and that they did this to avert civil war. The plans and the movements of the Tilden Democrats, most of whom were from the North, were thoroughly understood by Southern Democrats to be revolutionary, and to involve anarchy and fighting. The record of the yeas and nays on all filibustering votes, and others looking solely to delay in the count, bore out the statement of Senator Hill. It will be remembered that about the number of Democrats named stood together for at least two weeks before the Wormley Hotel conference in resisting every motion that was essentially one of delay, and that just about the same anti-filibustering vote followed the date of that conference.

As a squad of Confederate prisoners was being marched from the steamboat wharf to the Old Capitol prison toward the close of the war they gazed at a menagerie procession that they met with great interest. Finally the gigantic elephant "Hannibal" came along, directed by his keeper, a young man mounted on horseback. "Hi!" exclaimed one of the boys in gray; "Them uns makes me think of Richmond last winter, when old Humphrey Marshall and Alex Stephens used to go about like that ere elliphant and its keeper." As Marshall weighed over 300 pounds and Mr. Stephens less than 100 pounds, the comparison was good. It is related, and, I am inclined to think, truthfully, that John P. Hale once said to Mr. Stephens: "Why, Stephens, if you don't look out I will swallow you." "If you do," replied the Georgian, "you will have more brains in your body than you ever had in your head."

When the Woman Suffrage convention met in Washington in the winter of 1879, they called on President Hayes and presented resolutions adopted at the convention, following up with arguments in their favor. The President listened attentively until they had finished, and then asked them if they would not like to see Mrs. Hayes. They assented, and the President asked Mrs. Hayes to show them the White House, which she did, taking the ladies to the nursery, kitchen, and through all the chambers, pointing out the methods of housekeeping, and asking their opinions upon domestic subjects. The ladies expressed gratification at Mrs. Hayes' kindness, but carried an impression that they had been trifled with. Information about housekeeping was not what they were after.

President Taylor was probably the only President to whom the presidency was an uncoveted and unsought-for boon. Mrs. Taylor was so averse to public life that it was said she prayed every night during his candidacy for his defeat, and when told of his election, said: "Why could they not let us alone? we are so happy here. Why do they want to drag us to Washington?" Who that ever saw Gen. Taylor at a levee could forget him? He grasped every new-comer cordially by the hand, and saluted all, high and low, old maids, brides, young girls, all, with the words, "Glad to see you! Glad to see you! How's your family? Hope the children are all well." His greeting was almost equal to Rip's toast: "Here's to you and your family. May you live long and prosper!" He hardly ever opened his mouth without making a mistake, and people laughed heartily. Still they loved him, trusted his judgment, and knew his heart and hand were true as steel; and when he died the whole nation was a mourner at his grave. When Major Donelson returned from Europe he introduced him at a dinner party as "My friend Donelson, just from Berlin, Austria." During his candidacy Col. W., a State elector, after discussing several public topics, ask him what were his views on the tariff. "The what, Jack," said Gen. Taylor, who stuttered dreadfully. "The tariff, General," said Col. W. "Why! what's that?" "It's a sine qua non," said Col. W., who was one of the greatest wags that ever lived, "that the people are much excited about now." "A sine qua non," said Gen. Taylor, slowly; "I believe, Jack, I saw one in Mexico, but I forget what it looks like; and I'll be blamed if I have any views on the tariff."

Curious Mental Disorder.

Accounts are given of attacks to which the Esquimaux are sometimes victims, for which no name has been found. According to the description an Esquimaux, while sailing in his kajak upon a perfectly calm, smooth sea, is suddenly seized with a feeling that his boat is tipping to one side; he jumps to the other to preserve the equilibrium, but this only makes matters worse and he abandons himself to anxious and even frenzied attempts to keep the boat from tipping; he can no longer fish, and his troubles do not cease until he gets in sight of shore or of another boat. These attacks are not accompanied or preceded by any malaise or nausea; nor does there appear to be any true vertiginous sensation, but rather an hallucination of the sense of equilibrium. The attack occurs when the subject is apparently in full health and is unattended with headache, palpitations, convulsions, or paralysis.—Pittsburgh Times.

Stories of Lincoln.

During a conference, in reponse to certain remarks by the Confederate Commissioners requiring explicit contradiction, Mr. Lincoln animadverted with some severity upon the conduct of the rebel leaders, and closed with the statement that they had plainly forfeited all right to immunity from punishment for the highest crime known to the law. Being positive and unequivocal in stating his views concerning individual treason his words seemed to fall upon the Commissioners with ominous import. There was a pause, during which Mr. Hunter regarded the speaker with a steady, searching look. At length, carefully measuring his own words, Mr. Hunter said: "Then, Mr. President, if we understand you correctly, you think that we of the Confederacy have committed treason; that we are traitors to your Government; that we have forfeited our rights, and are proper subjects for the hangman. Is not that about what your words imply?"

"Yes," said Mr. Lincoln, "you have stated the proposition better than I did. That is about the size of it!"

There was another pause, and a painful one, after which Mr. Hunter, with a pleasant smile, replied: "Well, Mr. Lincoln, we have about concluded that we will not be hanged as long as you are President—if we behave ourselves."

This may possibly be misunderstood by some, but there is here as high a compliment as could have been paid to Mr. Lincoln—a trust in his magnanimity and goodness of heart.

At one time when very lively scenes were being enacted in West Virginia, a Union General allowed himself and his command to be into a dangerous position, from which it was feared he would be unable to extricate himself without the loss of his whole command. In speaking of this fiasco, Mr. Lincoln said: "Gen. —— reminds me of a man out West who was engaged in what they call heading a barrel. He worked diligently for a time driving down the hoops, but when the job seemed completed the head would fall in and he would have to do the work all over again. Suddenly, after a deal of annoyance, a bright idea struck him. He put his boy, a chunk of a lad, into the barrel to hold up the head while he pounded down the hoops. This worked like a charm. The job was completed before he once thought about how he was to get the little fellow out again. The boy was securely fastened up in the barrel.

"Now," said Mr. Lincoln, "that is a fair sample of the way some people do business. They can succeed better in getting themselves and others corked up than in getting them uncorked."—Ward H. Lamon, in Chicago News.

Counterfeiting Napoleon.

Boucher, a famous violinist during the first quarter of the century, bore a singular resemblance to Napoleon in countenance and figure. One evening at St. Petersburg he played at a concert, where the Czar, Alexander I., was present.

"Monsieur Boucher," said the Czar, as the violinist was presented to him, "I have a favor to ask of you. It is an affair," he continued, as Boucher bowed, "unconnected with your profession."

"I am wholly at your majesty's service," answered the violinist.

"Well, come to the palace to-morrow morning at 12 precisely. You shall be shown into my cabinet, which, if you will grant, will greatly oblige me."

The next day Boucher, on presenting himself at the palace, was ushered into the Czar's private cabinet. The Czar immediately led him into an adjoining apartment where he saw on a sofa a small three-cornered hat, a sword, the uniform of the French imperial guard, and a cross of an officer of the Legion of Honor.

"I will explain the favor I have to request. All those objects you see there belonged to the Emperor Napoleon; they were taken during the campaign of Moscow. I have frequently heard of your resemblance to Napoleon, but I did not expect to find the likeness so strong as it is. My mother often regrets that she never saw Napoleon, and what I wish you to do is to put on this dress and I will present you to her."

The Czar withdrew and left Boucher to array himself in Napoleon's uniform. When he had dressed he was led to the apartment of the Empress-mother. The Czar assured his mother that the allusion was complete, and that she might say she had seen "the great man."—Youth's Companion.

Omission of the Comma.

Some years ago the omission of a comma in a letter in the Times gave a horrible meaning to a sentence. The letter was on the American war, and the writer said: "The loss of life will hardly fall short of a quarter of a million; and how many more were better with the dead than doomed to crawl on the mutilated victims of this great national crime." It should have been: "That doomed to crawl on, the mutilated victims of this great national crime."

The following sentence appeared in a newspaper a short time ago: "The prisoner said the witness was a convicted thief." This statement nearly caused the proprietors of the newspaper some trouble, and yet the words were correct. When the attention was drawn to the matter and proper punctuation supplied the sentence had an exactly opposite meaning: "The prisoner, said the witness, was a convicted thief."

Dean Alford says that he saw an announcement of a meeting in connection with the "Society for Promoting the Observance of the Lord's Day which was founded in 1831," giving the notion that the day, not the society, was founded in that year. A comma should have been after "day," and then the sentence would have been correct.—London Exchange.

Butter and Oleomargarine.

Much has been said and written about the relative digestibility of butter and oleomargarine. The only actual comparative tests on record are a series made with a man and a boy by Prof. Mayer, in Holland. In these from 97.7 to 98.4 per cent. of the fat of the butter and from 96.1 to 96.3 per cent. of the fat of the oleomargarine were digested. The average difference was 1.6 per cent. in favor of the butter. Certain possible sources of error in such experiments make it a question whether the digestion was not in fact more nearly complete than even these figures make it. An interesting series of experiments in artificial digestion conducted by Dr. R. D. Clark, in behalf of the New York Dairy Commission, though of course not affording a definite measure of the process as it actually goes on in the body, accord with the very natural supposition that, in ease, and perhaps in completeness of digestion, oleomargarine would rank between butter and the fat of ordinary meat.

In chemical composition oleomargarine stands between meat-fat and butter. It will be remembered that oleomargarine is made from beef-fat and lard by removing from them parts of the stearin, which counts as the least digestible ingredient, and adding a little butter and sometimes oil, as cotton-seed oil. The bulk of all these fatty substances, meat-fat, butter, and oil, consists of the same or nearly the same kinds of fat, the meat-fat having the more stearin. The butter, however, contains small quantities, seven per cent. or thereabouts, of peculiar fats, butyrin, caproin, etc., which give it its flavor and which are thought by some to make it more easily digestible, especially by persons whose digestion is enfeebled by lack of digestive juices or otherwise.

In the excitement over oleomargarine legislation, the discussion of the relative digestibility of butter and butter substitutes has been made very active by the importance of its bearing upon their comparative values for nutriment, and many statements have been made as to the effect of the chemical composition of the peculiar butter-fats and the consequent chemical changes in the process of digestion and assimilation in the body. It is interesting to compare the very positive inferences which some writers upon the subject draw from experimental investigations, with the very guarded expressions of opinion made by the authors of the same investigations in their writings and in personal conversation. The facts at hand and the general impression of special students of these subjects, so far as I have observed, are to the effect that probably, for healthy persons, the difference between butter and oleomargarine in ease and in completeness of digestion would be almost very slight, but that for people with enfeebled digestion and for infants, butter may, perhaps, at times, have the advantage.—Prof. Atwater, in the Century.

Sherman and the Parson.

It was during the occupation of Memphis. Sherman had ordered all churches to be closed on Sunday. The day following the issue of the order the General was waited on by a man who was appareled in all the formal garb of the clergy, and whose face was made solemn by an expression suggestive of a willing martyr.

"Well, sir," said the General, "what is your mission?"

"I am an Episcopal clergyman," quoth the visitor, "and I am perplexed to know how to obey your order. There seems to be a conflict of authority. According to our church ritual we are now directed to pray for the Hon. Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States, and I am ecclesiastically bound to obey orders."

"Oh, never mind," said the General, "pray for Davis; pray for him with all your might and main. He needs all the prayers you can make; but, my friend, to be candid, I am very much afraid praying will do him no good now. He's gone up."

"Indeed?" said the pastor, with a bewildered look, "then shall I pray for Abraham Lincoln?"

"No, my dear sir, don't do that; he don't need any prayers. He is just as sure of salvation as any man that ever died or will die."

Out of curiosity Gen. Sherman attended the Episcopal Church the next Sunday.

The minister saw his distinguished visitor in the audience, and when he reached the point of conflict in the service between the Church North and the Church South, with one eye on the prayer-book and the other on Gen. Sherman, he said, "Bless the authority over us," without more specifically designating his superiors.—Pittsburgh Commercial-Gazette.

Women at Dinner.

Who are the best companions at a dinner? Women are almost invariably good company, but you should remember never to waste a good dinner on a woman. They have absolutely no idea of the delicacies and beauties of a thoroughly balanced dinner, and the younger they are the less able are they to appreciate the work of an accomplished chef. There is scarcely a woman in New York who would not rather put on a new gown and eat a wretched dinner amid the splendor of Delmonico's or the Brunswick than eat a capital dinner at a lowly restaurant.

A man, on the other hand, had rather eat a good dinner in a hovel than a bad one in a palace. What the women like is lots of tinsel, gold, cut-glass, colored lights, gorgeous ices, graceful champagne glasses, and strains of music. Give them those things and they don't give a rap for the rest. If you take a stupid friend to dinner you stand a very fair chance of having your meal spoiled unless he is a very old friend. If you know him very well you may indulge in long periods of silence the privilege of old friendship—and devote your entire attention to the dinner. In this case a stupid friend is often a blessing in disguise, for it is very annoying at times to be obliged to keep up a running fire of small talk when there is more important business on hand.—Hotel Gazette.

Where the Sun Shines at Midnight.

I am within 800 miles of the Arctic circle, where the sun may be seen at midnight in the summer, and in winter it is night the whole twenty-four hours. Even where I am now I do not think that the light of the sun is entirely gone at midnight, for at 11 o'clock I could see it, and, going to sleep then, I did not awaken until 3, and at that time the dawn of day was plainly seen.—Namaka (B. A.) letter, in Wheeling Intelligence.

PERSONAL CHARMS.

How the Delsartian Theory of Development Beautifies Women.

What is the Delsartian method?

If ladies can see the cultivation of the voice, so as to read and converse in sweetly modulated yet strong and deep tones, and by the same course of training acquire grace of carriage and the development of chest and lungs that ensures health and adds to personal charms, the methods employed are worthy investigation.

So thought our reporter, who called upon Mme. Gray, the noted teacher of Oratory and Physical Culture, at one of our leading hotels.

As he entered the room a lady tall but well proportioned came with graceful movement toward him. A well-shaped head, crowned with a wealth of iron gray hair, dark, brilliant eyes, beneath finely arched brows, were noted as she approached. When she spoke it was with a voice sweet and low, yet with a wonderful compass.

"What is the secret of this power of vocal expression you seem to have?"

"Secret? there is no secret," laughed Mme. Gray. "Time was when I had one of the weakest and thinnest of voices. Any one can accomplish what I have done. It is so easy to acquire a full, resonant voice, that will never tire or grow hoarse. All vocal disabilities may be overcome, hesitation, stammering, stuttering, soon disappear under proper training."

"Does this training affect the physical system?"

"Yes, it will develop the bust to almost ideal perfection. Gentlemen will add four or five inches chest measurement in as many months."

"It is desirable from a point of beauty, then?"

"Yes, ladies gain the roundness of waist, taper of arm and hand, and the perfect poise, ease and grace to movement, that add so much to personal charms."

"Health, I should think, would be benefited, also?"

"Indeed it is. Lung and throat troubles decrease, narrow chests and thin arms are developed, and female weakness largely overcome."

"It seems to be a regular panacea?"

"No, I am sorry to say that some organs cannot be made good in this way after they have been injured as mine were by a sojourn near a Southern swamp. Before I tried physical culture and Warner's safe cure I was a confirmed invalid. I was consumptive in early life, and it is only a few years since I overcame a serious liver trouble. I owe much to Warner's safe cure, and I do not hesitate to acknowledge it."

"And the consumptive tendency?"

"Disappeared after the use of this remedy, and when I learned how to breathe. Not one in twenty breathe in such a way as to fill the air-cells, to expand the strong muscles at the base of the lungs, which should do the labor of expelling air. Hence, if kidney disease prevails, the lungs affected by the kidney poisoned blood soon give way."

"Is not your system the Delsartian theory?"

"Yes, and I greatly rejoiced when this grand teacher gave to the world his ideas. They correspond to those I had long taught, for I am a pioneer in this work, and have devoted life and energy to teaching the world that women may gain vocal accomplishments, health, grace and beauty all at the same time by these methods of cultivation."

"You are yet teaching?"

"Yes, at the School of Oratory and Physical Culture at Syracuse, N. Y., a permanent institution, now in very successful progress."

Area and Population of Europe.

Gen. Streitbitski, who was selected by the International Statistical Congress held at The Hague to prepare a report upon the area and number of inhabitants in the different countries of Europe, has completed his labors, the gist of them being that the total area of Europe is 6,233,030 square miles, of which 3,123,185 square miles belong to Russia, 391,000 to Austria-Hungary, 338,000 to Germany, 333,435 to France, 312,830 to Spain, 291,615 to Sweden, 263,375 to Norway, 196,615 to Great Britain and Ireland, 190,310 to Italy, 163,350 to Turkey in Europe and Bosnia, 88,810 to Denmark, 82,125 to Roumania, 55,690 to Portugal, 40,435 to Greece, 30,375 to Servia, 25,875 to Switzerland, 20,625 to Holland, and 18,430 to Belgium. The Russian Empire in Europe alone covers more than half of the whole continent, embracing the Kingdom of Poland, the Grand Duchy of Finland, and part of the Caucasus.

Russia also stands far in advance of all the other nations in respect to her population, which is given by General Streitbitski at 93,000,000, the countries which come next being the German Empire (47,200,000), Austria-Hungary (39,000,000), France (38,300,000), Great Britain and Ireland (37,200,000), Italy (30,000,000), Spain (16,900,000) Switzerland (7,900,000), Belgium (5,853,000), Roumania (5,100,000), Turkey in Europe (4,900,000), Sweden (4,700,000), Holland and Portugal (4,400,000 each), Denmark (2,100,000), Servia (2,100,000), and Norway (1,900,000). Total for all Europe, 350,000,000. The density of the population is very different, for while Belgium has 201 inhabitants to the square kilometre (five-eighths of a mile), Holland 134, Great Britain and Ireland 118, Italy 105, the German Empire 86, Switzerland 71, and Austria-Hungary 58, Spain has only 35, Turkey 27, Russia 17, Denmark 15, and Norway 6. But the population of Russia is increasing at the rate of 1,250,000 a year, and in half a century it will, at this rate, exceed 170,000,000.

The above figures ascribe to Europe and Russia in Europe vastly more area than has usually been given to them.—London Times.

Peculiar Ways of Different Nations.

London Life calls attention to very peculiar differences in the customs of nations. Europeans uncover the head as a token of respect or reverence; Orientals never uncover it, and the Turkish ambassador is allowed to retain his fez even in the presence of Her Majesty. In church all men's heads are bare; in the synagogue it is considered wrong to remove the hat. In China to uncover the head is a mark of disrespect. To salute with the left hand is a deadly insult to Mohammedans in the East, and for this the native commissioned officers of the Indian army in giving the military salute confined it to the sword held in the right hand without at the same time raising the left hand to the forehead, as in the ordinary English salute. Unlike our women who, when they go out, adorn themselves most carefully, Thibetan women, when leaving their houses, smear their faces over with a dark, sticky substance. It is said that they do so in compliance with a certain Lama, King Nomehkhan, in order to protect their morals by making them look ugly when in public. The Thibetans also put out the tongue as a sign of respectful salutation, and in similar contradictions to our own customs the Malays, the Fijians, Tongas and many other Polynesians always sit down when speaking to a superior. At Natavulu it is respectful to turn one's back toward a superior, especially when addressing him; and among the Wahuma, in Congo and in Central Africa the same custom prevails. The Todas of the Neilgherry hills show respect by raising the open right hand to the face and resting the thumb on the bridge of the nose.

THE importance of soft water for domestic purposes is illustrated by the experience of a large London asylum, in which a change from hard to soft has resulted in an estimated annual saving in soda, soap, labor, etc., of more than $4,000.

SEASONS of depression in trade are generally followed by years of success and prosperity.

Three Sorts of Love.

In one of his novels Tolstoi dismisses for the time being the love felt by a young man for a young girl or vice versa—attachments which he says always fill him with dismay—and proceeds to divide love—by which he means love felt by a human creature for other human creatures—into three kinds—elegant love, devoted love, and active love. The first he defines as consisting in being enamored of the beauty of the sentiment which one experiences and in a complacent satisfaction in the expression of it.

"In my country," he goes on, "people of a certain class, who love in this elegant fashion, are not content to speak of it to everybody; they always speak of it in French. It is an absurd and grotesque thing to say, but I am convinced that there have been and are—in a certain circle—many persons, especially women, in whom the love they feel for friends, husband, and children would cease the moment it was forbidden to be expressed in French." Devoted love consists, on the other hand, in loving the operation of the sacrifice one makes in behalf of the beloved object, without troubling one's self in the least to ascertain whether the beloved object will find himself or herself the better or worse for it. This sort of love is analyzed and illustrated with astonishing penetration; the truth with which the author points out the jealousy, and the harassing nature of this love being at times almost painful. Thirdly, and finally, active love consists in a vehement desire to satisfy all the needs, wants, caprices, reasonable and unreasonable, of the beloved one.

Even the faults of the beloved are dear to those possessed of this love inasmuch as they furnish further needs to be satisfied. "Such persons," he adds, "rarely express their love in words, and if they do so it is awkwardly and shyly expressed, for they are always afraid of not loving enough."—London Society.

A sad story comes from Georgia concerning a young man who started on horseback to visit his affianced, who resided in a neighboring county. They had been engaged for some time, and his visit was for the purpose of arranging the final details. Nearing the house of his beloved, he came to a church and observed that a funeral was in progress. Prompted by idle curiosity—for he didn't suppose it was any of his funeral—he dismounted and went in. When the sermon was over he moved forward with the rest to view the lineaments of the departed, when imagine his horror to discover that it was his affianced bride, who had died without communicating the fact to him in any way. There is a moral in this, if you can only get at it. We think it is a warning to young men en route to see their fiancees not to loiter on the way, and it also shows the folly of attending funerals indiscriminately, a custom that prevails to an absurd extent in the country. Had the young Georgian kept right on about his business, he would have been spared a great shock, and had the melancholy news broken to him in a less abrupt manner.—Texas Siftings.

At Peace.

A stomach in revolt is an obdurate rebel. Corrected with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, its dissensions with the food introduced into it in unwary moments of appetite ceases. Then it is at peace. Then dyspepsia abandons its grip. Then such fractious manifestations as heartburn, a sinking sensation in the pit of the abdomen between meals and unnatural fullness afterward, flatulence, acid gulpings, biliousness, etc., cease to inflict martyrdom. After a course of the national tonic and alterative, the liver and bowels, always more or less disordered during a prolonged attack of indigestion, resume their functions and become regular. Thus not only dyspepsia but its concomitants, constipation and biliousness, are conquered by the medicine, which remedies their fruitful cause, weakness of the organs of digestion. The epigastric nerve, cellular tissue, in short, every organ that bears a part in the digestive processes, acquire vigor and regularity from the benign invigorant.

A Substitute for Prayer.

Somewhere in the country a number of ministers were wont to meet together on stated days for purposes pertaining to their calling. As might be supposed, each meeting was opened with prayer. But one day they met at the house of a brother who had a stock of excellent cigars, which he passed around freely. Soon all the brethren were puffing away, and before they knew it they had taken up the business of the meeting. Suddenly one of them remembered the forgotten prayer, and suggested that somebody make up for lost time. But one of the others was equal to the occasion. "Never mind now, Brother Y——," he said; "we have opened this meeting by offering up incense. Let that suffice."

A Popular Thoroughfare.

The Wisconsin Central Line, although a comparatively new factor in the railroad systems of the Northwest, has acquired an enviable popularity. Through careful attention to details, its service is as near perfection as might be looked for. The train attendants seem to regard their trusts as individual property and as a result the public is served par-excellence. The road now runs solid through fast trains between Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul and Minneapolis with Pullman's best and unequalled dining cars; it also runs through, solid sleepers between Chicago, Ashland, Duluth and the famous mining regions of Northern Wisconsin and Michigan.

$500 Reward.

If you suffer from dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody, and putrid; if the eyes are weak, watery, and inflamed, and there is ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers, the voice being changed and having a nasal twang; the breath offensive; smell and taste impaired; experience a sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough, and general debility, then you are suffering from chronic nasal catarrh. Only a few of the above-named symptoms are likely to be present in any one case at one time, or in one stage of the disease. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive, and dangerous, less understood, or more unsuccessfully treated by physicians. The manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy offer, in good faith, $500 reward for a case of catarrh which they cannot cure. The remedy is sold by druggists at only 50 cents.

Catarrh

May affect any portion of the body where the mucous membrane is found. But catarrh of the head is by far the most common, and, strange to say, the most liable to be neglected. It originates in a cold, or succession of colds, combined with impure blood. The wonderful success Hood's Sarsaparilla has had in curing catarrh warrants us in urging all who suffer with this disease to try the peculiar medicine. It renovates and invigorates the blood, and tones every organ.

"I have been troubled with that annoying disease, nasal catarrh, and have taken all kinds of blood purifiers, but never found relief till I used Hood's Sarsaparilla, which I am confident will do all that is claimed. Hurrah for Hood's Sarsaparilla!" J. L. ROUTT, Marksbury, Ky.

DAYLIGHT.

If a gentleman by the name of Day volunteers to throw the light of his experience into the darkened places of misery, so that others may go and do as he has done and enjoy life, may it not be reasonably called daylight? As for instance, take the case of Captain Sargent S. Day, Gloucester, Mass., who writes April 16, 1881: "Some time ago I was suffering with rheumatism. I used a small portion of St. Jacobs Oil and was cured at once. I have used it for sprains and never once have I known it to fail. I will never be without a bottle." Captain Day also received a circular letter, and in reply under date of July 1, 1887, he says: "I used the Oil as stated and was permanently cured of rheumatism by its use." During the intervening six years there had been no recurrence of the pain. Also a letter from Mr. H. M. Converse, of the Warren (Mass.) Herald, dated July 9, 1887, as follows: "In response to yours of June 22, would say that in 1881 my wife had a severe attack of rheumatism in shoulder and arm, so that she could not raise her hand to her head. A few applications of St. Jacobs Oil cured her permanently, and she has had no return of it." Another case is that of Mr. R. B. Kyle, Tower Hill, Appomattox county, Va., who writes, November, 1886: "Was afflicted for several years with rheumatism and grew worse all the time. Eminent physicians gave no relief; had spasms, and was not expected to live, was rubbed all over with St. Jacobs Oil. The first application relieved, the second removed the pain, continued use cured me; no relapse in five years, and do as much work as ever." These are proofs of the perfection of the remedy, and, taken in connection with the miracles performed in other cases, it has no equal.

The Fate of the Anarchists.

Russia has an autocracy in the person of the Czar; America has an autocracy in the supreme will of the people, which is the voice of God, and its decrees are always righteous.

Those who seek to overthrow society and destroy the law, should feel its strong arm in swift and severe punishment. In the fate of the Chicago anarchists the people have demonstrated the royal supremacy of the law, as they always will.

Let the good work go on. Hang Herr Most, and shut up within granite walls the impecunious blatherskites who, cloaking their true nature under the mantle of honest labor, go about inciting turmoil, and sowing the seed of unrest in a soil which God created for the growth of peace and happiness.

Treason is treason, here as well as elsewhere, and if the murderous doctrine of anarchists be not treason, what is it?

America is not so free that sedition may be promulgated right under the shadow of her school houses, and in the sunshine of her happy homes.

Hang all anarchists!

Sioux City Journal: Whatever conclusion the anarchist may come to in the premises, one thing is certain: he will be killed off like a wild beast at his first assault on society.

Springfield (Mass.) Union: Of all the enemies of society, therefore, the anarchist is least to be tolerated. His purpose is murderous, not warlike. His methods are those of the assassin.

New York Star: It was as wrong for tender-hearted clergymen to try to change Governor Oglesby's course by tears from the pulpit as it was for the anarchist to seek to accomplish the same result by threats.

Topeka Commonwealth: The anarchist question, and whether they should be hung or not, has nothing whatever to do with either capital or labor. It is simply a question whether murderers shall be punished and how.

Wheeling Intelligencer: There is a terrible meaning in what has just taken place. It says to all the world that when in this free country agitation becomes murder, the guilty shall certainly be treated as murderers.

Philadelphia Ledger: In murderous conspiracies of this kind every one who has part or lot in promoting them is a principal; there are no accessories and no degrees. They are all subject to death on the gallows.

Burlington Hawkeye: If the Republic is worth saving at all, it is worth saving from anarchism and all its attendant horrors. Yesterday's execution was not the fiat of vengeance against men, but mercy to mankind. Four lives were ended, but millions of lives were saved and untold woes averted.

New York Commercial Advertiser: If the anarchists are all feebleminded together, their capacities are yet too small to enable them to grasp the full meaning of the executions at Chicago. In reality, however, the anarchists are divided into two classes—villains and dupes—and Chicago teaches its lesson to both.

Boston Transcript: Bombs are prepared to slay policemen, because policemen protect order, and order protects the industrious from the raids of those with whom the world has gone wrong, and who in their frantic natures believe that the world belongs to the violent. How much pains is taken to set these misbegotten wretches right?

Dallas (Texas) News: Even in the freest country the civil authority, assailed with force, must unsparingly use force. Liberty has not yet found a footing anywhere but within the intrenchments of law. Order without law, to be maintained in the last resort by force, is a condition not conceivable anywhere but in a community of saints.

St. Louis Globe-Democrat: There is no chance for any theory to live and thrive here which conflicts with this great and potent sentiment in favor of ready and quiet submission to the mandates of justice as framed by our legislators and interpreted by our courts; and in this fact lies the country's assured safety and highest honor.

Omaha Herald: Death is a common affair. The death of a murderer, even, is common. So the triumph was not at the scaffold. A nation was not hounding four mortals to the tomb. The mere fact that the law is carried out should be the sequel to every crime. The question should be: "Guilty or not guilty!" It is not properly: "Punish or not punish!"

The New York Tribune delicately speaks of the recent execution as "the discontinuance of the anarchists in Chicago."

Northern Michigan News.

Sault Ste. Marie is to have an ice rink, 50x200 feet in size, under cover and lighted by electricity.

Route agent Roselle Rose has been promoted, and now has the route from Grand Rapids to Mackinaw.

The Manistique Pioneer says that hunters do not swarm in that section as heretofore, owing to the rigid enforcement of the game law.

Steel rails for the new Minneapolis, Sault Ste. Marie & Atlantic railroad are being transported northward over the G. R. & I. in large quantities.

This is the way they talk about boring for gas at the Soo: "And the drill should never stopped until gas is found, or the region of sulphur reached."

Harbor Springs Republican: The Cummings brought over 13 head of cattle from Beaver Island, one day last week, which C. R. Wright had purchased for C. W. Caskey.

The water in Lake Michigan and Little Traverse Bay is lower than it has been for two or three years. At the head of the bay the rocks stick up as though the tide had gone out.

Capt. Neil Gallagher has secured the contract for carrying the Beaver Island mail this winter, beginning Dec. 1st. The service is to be weekly when possible to cross to the Island at all.

A gas-pipe bomb was found on the Clarion office steps, at Reed City, one morning recently. Evidently the work of some anarchist sympathiser. "Ren" Parker says he has seen larger ones before.

Boyne Citizen: R. S. Hubbard leaves to-night for LaGrange, Ill., where he will spend the winter.——B. F. Ingalls has been visiting in Dakota and Iowa and left this week for San Diego, Cal. Mrs. Ingalls is much improved in health.

A good joke was played on the city marshal at Cadillac the other evening. When he carried their suppers to the birds in his cage he didn't keep his eye peeled well enough and one of them, a six-day drunk, skipped out, slamming the door and locking the marshal in.

One night recently wolves attacked some calves on the farm of Delphie Brunelle, on Sturgeon river, near Houghton. Mrs. Brunelle and her daughter took a lantern and rushed to the rescue and drove the howling beasts away. One of the calves had been half eaten.

The Duluth, South Shore & Atlantic railroad has still almost 100 miles of track to lay before it connects with the Northern Pacific. The Minneapolis, Sault Ste Marie & Atlantic may be a trunk line first after all. Anyhow it's the greatest railroad building race the country has ever seen.

The Pine lands in Missaukee county offered for sale by the G. R. & I. railroad company, have excited the interest of land buyers already. Sealed bids will be received by W. O. Hughart, Land Commissioner, to be opened Dec. 15th. Plats and further information can be had by addressing him at Grand Rapids.

Cheboygan Tribune: During the past week J. C. Brown has received by boat, 10,000 barrels of beef and 15,000 bushels of oats to supply his various camps in this county. Manager Curtis has been in town all week superintending the storing of this vast supply, and every building available, from the spacious store houses down to barns and sheds, were procured to shelter this enormous stock.

Petoskey Record: Mr. and Mrs. J. A. C. Rowan left on Monday morning for Grand Rapids, whence they will go to Chicago and other places in Illinois to visit friends. While absent the Clifton will be in charge of Frank Ferriman, the Clerk. Now Frank, show the people that you can run a hotel while you have a chance. Be sure to remember the calls, as the proprietor, you know, was never known to miss a call, even if the guest was deaf and dumb.

East Jordan Enterprise: "Little Frank," [the Portuguese sailor] is very sick, and has been removed to Dr. Willard's house for treatment.——P. L. Lanway is going to buy furnace wood this winter.——Mrs. W. F. Freer, of Dwight, died suddenly on Tuesday evening at six o'clock. The remains were taken east Wednesday for interment.——The intermediate bridge, which would give the people of Banks direct communication with East Jordan, should be built at once.

Mancelona Herald: On Monday, Dec. 5, the counties of Antrim, Benzie, Grand Traverse and Leelanaw will vote on the question of prohibition inside their boundaries. As these counties all gave majorities in favor of prohibition last spring, it is altogether probable that the measure will carry next month. There is no question but that local option is preferable to State prohibition, as it can be carried only where it can be enforced. Localities that cannot give prohibition a majority vote would hardly be prepared to enforce the law, and a law not enforced, is, in our estimation, worse than no law.

Petoskey Democrat: The rumor is afloat that Cross Village is on the anxious bench, and has the railroad fever so bad that she, in conjunction with Harbor Springs, was obliged to secure the services of the surveyors to allay the fever. We do not blame Cross Village one particle for wanting a railroad. The village is pleasantly located on a high plateau overlooking the lake; it is surrounded on the east and south by some of the very finest land in Emmet county. With its natural advantages there is no reason why Cross Village cannot become a town of five or six thousand inhabitants; but shut off as it is at present, without a railroad, this can never be expected. A railroad through the western part of the county would be a great benefit; it would make the lands more valuable, and give the people in that section an available market. By all means boom the Cross Village railroad.

Traverse Bay Eagle: Two years ago we distributed quite a quantity of seed of the so-called Cuban corn among our subscribers. The great advantage claimed for it was its great yield, the stalks producing from two to five perfect ears each. The kernel was shrunken and looked inferior. We had some doubts also as to its ripening in this latitude. The first year those who tested it in the majority of cases reported it a failure, but a few thought well of it, and tried it again this season. The result shows that the corn is greatly improving the longer it is planted here. The yield is becoming greater rather than less, as the ears are larger and more perfect than at first, and the kernel is better and finer in every way. It also ripens earlier. We have samples of the first seed sent out by us, also of the product of the first year, and of the present season. The result would seem to show that the variety is one that can be grown with profit here.

Bellaire Breeze: Roswell Leavitt was at Charlevoix this week attending meetings of the D. C. & E. R. R. Co. At the stockholder's meeting the line of the road was extended to Mackinaw and the stock of the company increased to two millions of dollars. These steps were necessary in making arrangements for the construction of the road. At the directors' meeting reports were received from the committees appointed to secure the right of way through Charlevoix, Antrim and Kalkaska counties, by which reports it appears that all but one of the resident occupants of land touched by the present surveyed line of the road in Charlevoix county have given the right of way; that only one such occupant in Antrim county had refused to sign the contract, and that only a small number in Kalkaska county refuse such right of way. This opposition on the part of a few is all that delays the commencement of work. Chief Engineer Beardslee has gone to Kalkaska to make the necessary measurements preparatory to condemning the lands of those who refuse to sign the contracts and will come from there to Antrim county for the same purpose. Some non-resident land and village property will have to be condemned in each county. It is uncertain when work will commence, as nothing else can be decided upon until the right of way is all secured.

Bellaire Breeze: The East Jordan Lumber Co. has three camps in Jordan Township.——No crossing at the Webster bridge now for the reason that the old bridge is torn away and a new one is being built. Frank Severance has the contract for the bridge proper and Mr. Jacquays for the abutments.——Daniel Flanagin of Atwood, went to Grand Rapids last week to purchase a shingle mill to put into the saw mill at Kewadin.——Rev. M. W. Knapp, the evangelist of Albion, is holding meetings in the town hall, at Atwood. The meetings are well attended and a deep interest manifested. Quite a number have been converted.——Speaking in a general way, no township in the Grand Traverse region can show a better record for the past ten years than can Central Lake. If there has been no boom to urge the wheels of progress to unwarranted speed, neither has there been a retrograde movement. The growth of the town has been slow, steady and substantial. Farms are better, clearings larger, buildings plentier, houses more comfortable. People are better clothed, better fed, and, as far as our opinion goes, are happier.——Rumor saith that those fellows out around Eastport had a chance to buy an old rebel flag from a rag peddler last week for the nominal sum of $5. This trophy was some eighty feet in length, and as it bore the inscription "Nashville" it is supposed that it once belonged to a Confederate blockade runner of that name. It had been lying around the garret of a woman near Elk Rapids for the past 20 years, and she, either in the simplicity of her heart or the dread of another flag proclamation from Mein Herr Cleveland, sold it to an Israelite for old rags. As no one would buy, the Sheeny folded it up and silently fled to the northward.

"Mother is Dead."

Sorrow broods upon blackened wing,
Death has come with its cruel sting;
Hearts are bleeding, pleading and crushed,
While rooms are darkened and voices hushed.
A mother sleeps, and a world of care
Has passed from the brow of marble there;
And the sweet, white lips are closed for aye,
Heedless, at last, to the children's cry.

A motherless brood, with aching hearts,
A new, fresh grief, as each day departs,
Nothing remains save a deep, black pall
And mocking echoes through room and hall,—
Echoes of earth on a coffin lid,
Thoughts of a face forever hid,
Shafts of pain that pierce and rend,
Sobbing farewells to our only friend.

Echoes of mother's words and song,
Echoes that come in a hurrying throng—
Of kindness, and love, and patient ways,
Of watchful care through nights and days.
Memory of hands with toil acquaint,
Of burdens borne with no complaint;
Echoes of prayers, and hopes, and fears,
A perfect trust through many years;

Echoes of that we did or said
To whiten the hair in that mother's head;
Memory of acts, in a childish mood,
That showed to her ingratitude.
Vainly we call, and cry, and weep,
We cannot awaken from that sleep
The mother who loved us and gave us birth,
Her dear form rests 'neath a swell of earth.

But night has fallen, the day is done,
And sorrow reigns on his dread, black throne.
"Mother is dead!" is our wailing cry,
And hollow echoes go hurrying by.
Oh! who can tell of a mother's love?
Who can measure, save God above?
And who can tell of a mother's loss,
Save those who bear that heavy cross!

—Guy Davidson, in Good Housekeeping.

TAFFY, THE WELSHMAN.

His proper name was William or Billy Roberts. But hailing from Holyhead, whence his father had sailed as channel pilot for years, and, moreover, having a strong Welsh "burr" on his tongue, we at once nicknamed him Taffy—the silly pseudonym for a Welshman.

"We" means Tom Derrington and the present writer. At the time of which I speak I had turned my sixteenth year, and with Tom above named had shipped as ordinary seamen, after two deep water passages, with Captain Carver in the ship Salem. Taffy, who was about the same age, joined us at London, and we three, through Captain Carver's kindness, were allowed to occupy the "boys' room"—for this was in the palmy days of American ships and American seamen.

"If you two chaps get ahead this voyage as fast as you did the two others you have sailed with me, I'll give one of you a second mate's berth the very first chance," Captain Carver had said, and of course this put us both on our mettle to do our level best.

But after Taffy came aboard, Tom and I found that he knew more of seamanship, both theoretically and in practice, than the pair of us put together. And I am ashamed to say that we were both mean enough to cherish that sort of petty spite against him which naturally rises from secret envy.

As I have said, this was in the days of American ships and sailors. Further, it was in the days of the "wild packets," which are now only a memory that will remain with some of us seafarers forever.

For the average packet sailor was something more than a "hard citizen" in those days. The worst of them, banded together in a sort of secret society known as the "bloody forties," comprised a gang of as thoroughly reckless and criminal desperadoes as ever stepped over a ship's rail—and I may add as thorough seamen as ever manned a yard.

As it unfortunately happened, men were scarce in Liverpool when the ship was ready to sail, and Captain Carver was obliged to take such as he could get. And to do them strict justice, in all my seafaring days I cannot recall seeing eight such villainous looking faces in one lot as those that made up our new crew.

There was trouble from the first day out. The men had been accustomed to ship discipline backed up by a revolver and a pair of brass knuckles, worn and used at the slightest show of insubordination. Captain Carver, on the other hand, had heretofore allowed neither threats nor abuse on the part of his officers, so that it soon became evident that unless some decided action was taken, open instead of half disguised mutiny would be the result.

We were bound for New York in ballast. Cotton freights were at their best, and in his stateroom Captain Carver had upward of forty thousand dollars in gold—the freight money of the preceding voyage. Unfortunately the steward who was a garrulous Cockney, whether purposely or not, had made known the fact to the crew. And this without doubt laid the train for what followed.

It was in midsummer, and the ship, making the southern passage, was fifteen days out from Liverpool. Mr. Duffries, the mate, went forward in the dog watch to see that the sidelights were burning clear, as we were in the direct track of steamers and sailing vessels. He never came back.

None of the men knew anything as to his disappearance. The man on the lookout swore that as Mr. Duffries came up on the t'gallant forecastle, he—the lookout—stepped down to get a light for his pipe. When he returned Mr. Duffries was not there, and of course—so said the sailor—he presumed the mate had gone aft. So in like manner testified all the rest.

Nothing could be done about it, for nothing could be proved, as a matter of course. There had been no sound of blow or scuffle or splash in the water. All was wrapped in mystery, and Captain Carver was terribly worked up.

Mr. Grier, a canny Scotchman—was promoted to the position of first officer. Which of us two would be chosen to fill the second mate's berth was the unspoken question in my own and Tom's mind, as a matter of course.

On the following evening, at the beginning of the dog watch, Taffy was sent to put away the marline spikes, tarpots, and the like, in the "bo'sun's locker," a sort of closet under the t'gallant forecastle. He was absent so long that I think both Mr. Grier and Captain Carver imagined that something might have happened to him. But just as the wheel was relieved at eight bells, Taffy made his appearance aft. Instead of entering the boy's room, he made his way, "sneaked," so Tom and I said, into the cabin, where he remained closeted nearly an hour with Captain Carver.

"Say, fellers," he whispered, as he softly closed the doors, "theer's trouble ahead for sure." And then before either of us could speak, Taffy went on hurriedly and briefly to tell us that while under the t'gallant forecastle, unknown to the crew, he had heard Casey and a fellow known as Brock, the two ringleaders, laying plans with the others to take charge of the ship some time during the middle watch, murder the two remaining officers, scuttle the vessel and escape in the two boats with the gold. Mr. Duffries had been quietly disposed of the night before by a knife thrust, and softly dropped over the side, so they reckoned on an easy accomplishment of the rest. We three "boys" were to be left to go down with the sinking ship!

Taffy then unfolded a desperate plan to frustrate the plot which had occurred to Captain Carver, who unfortunately had no weapon of any kind in the cabin with the exception of a single-barreled holster pistol. What this plan was will be seen shortly. But three more excited young fellows never obeyed the summons to "turn out" and relieve wheel and lookout, than Tom, Taffy and myself, at eight bells of the middle watch.

It was my first wheel—I relieving Casey, the acknowledged ringleader of the gang. With a heart that throbbed like a trip hammer, I took the spokes from his hands and received the course—"sou'west by west."

I saw Captain Carver glance quickly forward, as a murmur of voices from that part of the ship reached our ears. Suddenly putting out his foot as the sailor was passing, he at the same moment clutched Casey by the throat, and, bending him backward over the rail, hurled him headlong into the sea.

The whole affair took place so quickly that not a sound or cry escaped the sailor's lips. And hardly was the deed done when Captain Carver thundered out:

"Man overboard! Hard down the wheel—hard down! Aft here to the boat, three or four of you! Mr. Grier let fly head sheets! Brace aback the after yards!"

Knowing a second later that Casey was the missing man, and never suspecting the ruse, four sailors rushed aft, the quarter boat was swung outboard, and three minutes later it was cleaving the water toward the spot where Casey's head could be plainly seen in the moonlight.

But scarcely was the boat twenty feet away, before Captain Carver, drawing the heavy pistol from his breast, sprang to the break of the quarter. At the same moment, in obedience to his order, I rapidly shifted the wheel.

"Now, Mr. Grier!" And then followed the stern commands to trim down the head sheets and round in the yards.

"I'll shoot the first man of you that refuses duty like a dog!" shouted the now thoroughly excited captain—and the three remaining scoundrels saw that the game was up.

In less time than I have taken to write it, the yards were braced in, and the ship, heading her course, was leaving the boat far astern.

Brock, Bill Matthews and Fox were sternly ordered to step forward. Captain Carver's remarks to them were brief and to the point. The first look or sign of insubordination would be punished with short shrift. Their scoundrelly companions would probably escape to be hung. On arrival the trio would be handed over to the authorities. Go for'ard!

When, on the following morning, Taffy was made second officer, Tom and I were speechless with astonishment and indignation. And short handed as we were, we had double duty to do for the rest of the passage, which naturally increased our hard feelings toward him. So that as far as we dared, we both showed our resentment in a very marked manner, thus making his office trebly difficult.

Fortunately we were favored with good weather, and a leading breeze which followed the ship almost into New York harbor. Here the three sailors managed to slip over the side into the tugboat and get off safely. I afterward heard that the boat containing the others was picked up bottom up by the Oceanica.

Taffy stayed by the ship till her return passage. Tom and I drifted away from each other in different ships and two years later I joined a small, swift sailing English fruiting schooner, bound from Liverpool to the Western Islands, as mate.

On the night of December 23, 1851, the schooner took the ground near Aberdovey in St. George's Channel and was driven over the bar into shoal water, with an ebbing tide and an awful sea running. The masts went by the board, and with them three of the five men composing our entire ship's company. Jim Trefethern shook hands with me and started to swim to the rocks only a cable's length distant. His battered body was recovered by the coast guard next day.

My left arm was broken by a swing of the main boom, but I managed to lash myself to the stump of the mainmast, and benumbed with the drenching seas and icy blast, lay in a half stupefied condition. My only hope was that I could hold out till morning with a possibility of being rescued by the coast guard.

But gradually numbness of the extremities was followed by the terrible torpor which I knew was a prelude to perishing of cold and exhaustion. Vainly I fought against it, till it seemed at last that I must yield.

But, just as the first glimmer of the gray dawn broke through the fog, I heard a distant shout. Raising my head, I could make out through the driving mist and spray that a large life-boat had safely passed the surf line and was steering directly for the stern of the wrecked schooner, which was fast breaking up.

But the tide had ebbed so much that the boat's deep draught would not permit of a nearer approach. Rounding to under her rag of sail, an anchor was thrown out, and a little later three or four men in cork jackets and the cumbersome-looking rig of the crew of an English life-boat leaped over the side with a life-line.

"Hold on a bit longer, matey," cheerily sang out the one who took the lead, and just conscious enough to recognize Taffy's voice, I was transferred from the wreck to the anchored life-boat, where a dose of raw spirits poured down my throat brought back the ebbing life to my frame.

An hour later, my arm was being set by a surgeon as I lay in my warm nest of blankets in the only public house in Aberdovey village, while Taffy, whose weather-beaten young face glowed with pleasure, sat by my side. Tiring of merchant service he had chosen a more precarious one as one of the crew of the Aberdovey life-boat nearly two years previous.

"It's worth all th' hardship I've been through just to ha' been head one in savin' of you, Harry. I allus liked you for all you took offense wi' me," said the honest fellow, as we shook hands at parting on the following morning.

"You've shown me what returning good for evil means, anyway, Taffy," I said. And he had.—Golden Argosy.

How the Cadets at West Point Pass Their Vacation—Hard Work the Rule.

Of all the drills and exercises in which the cadet excels he is at his best in those of the mounted service. Daring horsemen are the youngsters after two years' practice in the riding hall, and light battery drill is a famous place for exhibition. Watch the boys as they go to their stations. The seniors, in their [illegible] gauntlets, and cavalry sabres, swing easily into the saddles of the somewhat vicious-looking steeds that are held in readiness for them, adjust their stirrups, take a preliminary and surreptitious dig with their spurred heels to test the mettle of their nags, then clatter off to their posts to look over the horses and drivers of their detachments. The yearlings in their natty shell jackets stand ready at the guns; the bugle [illegible] the signal, "cannoneers mount," and, like so many agile monkeys, they spring to their seats on the ammunition chests, and with another [illegible] blast, and rumble of hoof and wheel and clink of trunnion, away goes the battery down the gravelly plain. There are a few preliminary moves to warm them up to their work; the battery commander, a young artillery officer who knows his trade, swings them to and fro, faster and faster, from one formation to another—column, line, and battery—and then, as though ordered to check the advance of an enemy swarming up the heights and give him canister at short range, with cracking whips and plunging steeds and rattle and roar of hoof and wheel, and hoarse-throated commands and stirring bugle-peals, up the plain they come at tearing gallop until opposite the crowd of spectators at the guard tents, where there is a short, sudden blast, a simultaneous shout from the "chiefs," a vision of rearing horses as the lieutenants and sergeants halt short on line with the brilliant guidon—generally the most picturesque horseman of the warlike throng, and always posted on the flank nearest the ladies—a flash of sabres in the air, a sudden "rein in" of the line of caissons, and gradual settle down to a stand, long before which, nimble as cats, the cannoneers have sprung from their seats, and are streaking it across the gap to where the chiefs are seated on their excited chargers. Around sweep the guns with sudden swirl that well nigh capsizes them—the three youngsters on each limber seemingly hanging on as though seated on sticking plasters—there is a rattle and bank of pintle-hooks, hoarse shouts of "Drive on" to the gun teams; gray and white forms leap and sway in and out among the wheels; sponges and rammers whirl in air; there is a belch of flame, smoke, and thunder-cloud, a bellowing roar; another, another—half a dozen in quick succession, a thick, sulphurous haze settles down on the plain and envelops guns and gunners; and suddenly comes another blare of bugle. "Cease firing" is the shout, and the mimic scene of Buena Vista is over. Even before the smoke has cleared away another order is given, with prompt, exciting response, plunging horses, cracking whips, a rush of teams, limbers, and caissons between the black muzzles of the guns; a sudden whirl about of wheels and handspikes, and the next moment smoke and flame are belching in thunder-claps over the very ground where stood the waiting teams only a moment before. Then comes still another signal, a stowing away of handspikes and rammers, a rapid rein-about of the limber-teams, another blare, and away they go, the white legs of the cannoneers flashing in a race beside their bounding guns; a rush across the road to the edge of the grassy level beyond, and another sudden whirl into battery, a thundering salute to the rocky heights to the west, an echoing roar from the great columbiads and Parrotts at the "sea-coast" down by the Hudson, and the Point fairly trembles with the shock and concussion. There is no hour of the day to match the excitement and elan of that of battery drill.—Captain Charles King, in Harper's Magazine.

CHICAGO, Nov. 10.

Louis Lingg, one of the condemned anarchists, killed himself in his cell at the jail, at 9 o'clock this morning, with a small gas-pipe bomb, which he had secreted in his cell. Death was instantaneous.

Vain Appeals for Clemency Made to Gov. Oglesby in Behalf of the Anarchists.

The friends of the condemned anarchists invaded Springfield, Ill., on Wednesday, the 9th inst., and besieged Governor Oglesby with their arguments and petitions. The reasons given for the exercise of executive clemency in the case were numerous enough, as no two of the speakers seemed to hold the same views upon the subject.

Capt. Black made the opening speech, and was listened to most respectfully by the distinguished audience of one. Capt. Black was keyed up to the highest tension and his very soul was aroused to the task. He is essentially a man of great nervous force, and as his passionate utterances fell on the ears of the audience the effect was clearly perceptible. ... Gen. M. M. Trumbull followed Capt. Black in an earnest plea for mercy. ... Williams Bailey and John Campbell, representing the labor organizations of Quincy, Ill., made short pleas for mercy. Pretty Eagle and the other chiefs then returned to their camp. The cavalry were drawn up in full field order on the eminence in front of the Indian position. The Indians soon began riding about and singing war songs. At the end of the time allowed the Indians to come in with the bad young men the cavalry advanced, the infantry took position, and the Indians opened fire. At the first volley Corporal Charles Sampson, of troop K, 1st cavalry, was shot dead. Private Eugene Molloy, of troop K, was wounded four times. The cavalry now advanced upon the Indians, driving them into the brush. Sword-Bearer and four other Indians were killed.

THE ANARCHISTS.

[illegible]

This story, like all the others concerning the anarchists which come from Pittsburgh, does not require much wit to disprove. Chief of Police Ebersold said that the story on its face was but a sensational creation and did not deserve a second thought. Michael Schwab, the condemned anarchist, came as near laughing at the story as it is possible for a man to come with the rope dangling before his eyes. "The story is utterly improbable," said he. "The statement that Owens, before he went to Pittsburg, was a partner of Schnaubelt is untrue. The young man who was the alleged bomb thrower's friend and intimate acquaintance is a young mechanic who never attended a meeting or had anything in common with Schnaubelt's views. He is still in Chicago. I know of no such person as Owens." "It's absurd," was Parsons' sententious comment on the Owens "confession," and then he promptly walked away to avoid an interview.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN, immediately on receiving the news of the Supreme Court decision, rushed off to a telegraph office in Omaha and sent the following dispatch:

Citizen Edward Devine, Editor Western News-room, Chicago:
Leave Cock-Roche-Ville to Cock-Roche, and join me at Toronto. Expatriation forever.
GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN.

"There, that settles it. I'm off for Canada, where there is free speech and free press. No more Omaha, I'm off. Good-by, America!" were the last words delivered by Train.

GEORGE ENGEL, the condemned anarchist, tried to commit suicide in his cell by taking opium early Sunday morning. Says a Chicago dispatch:

By the prompt use of the usual remedies given in cases of poisoning he was restored to consciousness in about ten minutes. Dr. Gray, as soon as he saw Engel, said that he had taken some powerful opiate. The pupils of his eyes were widely dilated, and the action of his heart was almost imperceptible. When the anarchist recovered consciousness an effort was made to induce him to drink some coffee or swallow an antidote. He firmly declined to take anything whatever. "If you let me cook it myself I'll drink some coffee," he said, but when the jail officials consented to that Engel said he "had changed his mind," and refused to eat anything. He positively denied that he had attempted to commit suicide, but said that "he had been drinking a little whisky." "Where did you get it?" he was asked. "Oh, I get it easy enough," he answered.

THE discovery of dynamite in the cell of one of the condemned Chicago anarchists was the reigning sensation in Chicago on Sunday. A Chicago special of Monday says:

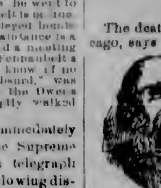
DR. MOSES GUNN DEAD.

The Brilliant Surgeon's Career Cut Short by Maglignant Disease.



MOSES GUNN.

The death of Dr. Moses Gunn of Chicago, says a dispatch from that city, was a severe blow to the medical profession. Like Dr. Gross of Philadelphia or Dr. Sayre of Buffalo, he was what is called "a giant" in the profession, known far and wide. He died of a malignant form of liver disease. Dr. Gunn was celebrated as much for his clean and honorable conduct toward his brother professionals as for the rapidity and accuracy with which he diagnosed all cases brought before him. His profound, rapid judgment was considered something wonderful, and all who knew him remember him best for that.

He was regarded by many of the leading surgeons as the best man in the profession to call in for consultation, and his clear, quick judgment was always invaluable on such occasions.

Dr. Gunn was never in greater glee than when, surrounded by his students, he was at work upon a patient, and he always had a joke which aided in fixing what was difficult of remembrance in his students' memories. His droll stories were as familiar to the rising medical profession as "household words." His most technical lectures fairly bubbled over with wit and originality, and it was contrary to his very nature ever to become tedious. Whenever his familiar "that reminds me of something" was spoken his class knew at once that some rich fun was in store.

Dr. Gunn had been in Chicago twenty years, practicing nothing but surgery, at which he was a recognized authority. All this time he had held the chair of surgery at Rush Medical College. The graduates from that institution can testify to his superiority as an instructor.

Dr. Gunn was born in Ontario County, ...

RETROSPECTIVE GLANCE

A Look Backward at the Deed of May 4, 1886, and Its Awful Results.

The Fatal Bomb Thrown Into the Ranks of the Police and the Destruction It Wrought.

A meeting of armed anarchists and agitated laborers was in progress at Haymarket Square, Chicago, on the evening of May 4, 1886. Turbulence, envenomed oratory, and heated passions were markedly apparent. Spies and Parsons had just descended from the wagon where, in gory speeches, they had advocated the use of arms and violence as the only way by which the "wage slaves" could procure emancipation from their present "bondage." But four-and-twenty hours before, instigated by similar oratory, the mob had assaulted the non-union men at McCormick's Reaper Works, and in a subsequent encounter with the police one of their number was killed and several wounded. They were not in a mood for interference. Consequently, when 180 men from the Desplaines Street Station marched into the Haymarket Square, and Capt. Ward ordered the meeting to disperse in the name of the law, it needed little more than Fielden's remark, "Here come the bloodhounds, you do your duty, and I'll do mine," to urge the malcontents and anarchists to open hostilities. A bomb was thrown, and falling between two columns of policemen mowed them down like a cyclone. Not one of the front rank was left standing. This was followed in rapid succession by a volley of firearms, and more policemen bit the dust. Up to this time not a shot had been fired by the officers, not a club drawn. They were appalled by the suddenness of the attack, and were on the verge of disorder and flight when Capt. Bonfield stepped into the breach and loudly called on his men to rally. What was left of them responded, and grasping their revolvers they advanced steadily, firing as they went. When their ammunition gave out they drew their batons and vigorously clubbed all within their reach. In the face of such determined bravery the cowardly curs who composed the mob could not stand, and after halting for but an instant they turned and fled precipitately from the scene of danger. One of their number was left dead on the square, while eager hands set to work in caring for the dying and wounded. From every foot of ground in the vicinity came moans of anguish. Here a policeman cried in tortured voice for help, and there a wounded anarchist gasped out his life in framing some malediction on the police.

EX-REBELS FALSIFYING HISTORY.

Jackson, Cleveland's late minister to Mexico, in attempting to defend his recent rebel speech in glorification of Jeff Davis and secessionism deliberately falsifies history as follows:

"It has been my conviction all my life that the model government would be reached on this earth through local sovereignty as opposed to the centralization of power. It is my conviction, therefore, as it has always been, that when the solution of the problem of human government is found it will be found in a lodgment of local sovereignties, in local commonwealths. It was the triumph of this principle of which I spoke in my address. It was for this principle that Mr. Davis fought and against this principle that Mr. Lincoln fought. Mr. Davis represented State sovereignty. Mr. Lincoln stood for a centralized nation. When my prediction comes true, if it should come true, that the true principle of successful government is local rights lodged in local sovereignties, in that triumph Mr. Davis would take precedence by virtue of the triumph of the principle of government for which he fought."

A greater amount of falsehood than is contained in the above could hardly be crammed into the same number of words. The platform on which Lincoln ran in 1860 expressly disclaimed any intent to interfere with the States, and emphatically pledged the Republican party to "the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively." What could be more explicit? Accepting without reserve or qualification the Constitution as it then stood the Republican party disclaimed any right or intent to interfere with slavery in the States, and in language which it is impossible to misconstrue affirmed that the so-called State sovereignty about which Jackson prates should remain "inviolate." On all occasions Mr. Lincoln reiterated these pledges, and no man was ever firmer bound than he to respect the rights of the States. In claiming to the contrary Jackson simply displays monumental ignorance or a willful attempt to falsify the plain, indisputable facts of history.

dents in this country, and is the allegiance of our people divided? Let no Democratic paper again speak of the "bloody shirt," when secession is paraded openly throughout the South.—Albany Journal.

Monumental Gall.

With brazen assurance, the Boston Globe says:

"The Democratic party is the most thoroughly national political organization that has ever existed in this country. It flourishes in every State, and in no State is the percentage of majority against it a large one. On the other hand, in many States the Republican party is practically extinct. In a whole section of the Union it consists in the main of a mass of voters whom, if white-skinned and living in Massachusetts, men like Senator Hoar would certainly insist upon disfranchising. Yet, even with this body of easily led voters, traditionally attached to it, the Republican party in the South can scarcely be said to exist."

What determines the nationality or sectionalism of a party? Does the question turn on the doctrines and practices of the organization, or on its success in nullifying the Constitution, violating the laws, and usurping power by violence and fraud? Plainly, the Boston Globe holds to the latter opinion. Hence its claim that the State sovereignty organization which still clings to the dogmas of Calhoun and Jeff Davis is a national party because it has succeeded in usurping power through organized political crime and now governs the nation in the interest of a minority section. If nationality is embodied in the idea of stamping out equal rights and making the vote of an ex-Confederate equal in political power to the votes of two or three Northern men, and so giving the rule of the nation into the hands of a sectional minority, then the Democratic party may have some claim to a "national" title. That organization is national only in its appetite for national spoils. Its supreme ambition is to usurp control of the Southern States and, with the aid of the vote of New York City, corner the Presidency and pension State sovereignty bigots and ex-rebels on the National Treasury in pursuance of usurped minority rule.—Chicago Tribune.

On the Field of Gettysburg.

BY ENA WALTON.

On the field of Gettysburg,
When the battle fever was o'er,
A soldier lay in his gore,
Around him, there, on either side,
His brother soldiers lay,
Groaning and moaning in their pain,
Waiting the coming day.

The soldier dreamed of home and friends;
His angel wife, he thought, was near,
His little children gathered round,
And all were there his heart to cheer;
Their loving arms were round his neck,
And bright, sweet glances from their eyes
Gave light into his weary heart,
As stars light up the eastern skies.

Just then the moon sailed from a cloud,
And shed o'er earth her silvery light;
The soldier woke, his wife was gone,
And his children, with their faces bright
He raised his head and looked around—
With the dead he was there alone!
A low, deep sigh came on the air,
And the soldier's work on earth was done.

Capture of the Steamboat Fox.

BY WILBUR D. WEBBER.

THE capture of New Orleans had taken the whole Confederacy by surprise. For weeks afterward it was all the talk, either in camp, in society, or in business. The Yankees had gained a feather by doing a thing we did not think them capable of. In the latter part of May, 1862, after the capture of New Orleans became stale, a few Confederate officers, commissioned in the Confederate States Navy, and idling their time away in Mobile waiting for a vessel with which they could escape to sea, conceived a wild plan of capturing a steamboat from near the mouth of the Mississippi River. The officers mentioned were Captain Jefferson and Lieutenant Howell, the latter a brother-in-law to President Jefferson Davis.

... of the capture. The watchman was surprised and captured without the least noise—in fact, everything seemed to work in our favor.

Paul and Cordray entered the pilot house and rang forward on the engines. The call was soon answered by the new engineer. The most convenient combustible substances were got into a shape to put into the furnace, without regard to value, and the fire was soon roaring. Our lantern signals were being hoisted as we swung into mid-channel, and the wheels revolved faster and faster as the boilers became heated. Strange to say, not an attempt was made to stop us, or even ask any questions, and we were soon out in the Gulf heading for the Chandeleur Islands. Under cover of the islands steam was shut off, and a consultation held as to what should be done with the prisoners. After the decision was made, the prisoners, consisting of the officers and crew of the Fox, and a few passengers, were called forward, when Captain Jefferson addressed them in something like the following language.

"Gentlemen, the fortunes of war have made you prisoners to the Confederate States Cutter Lark, and as the cutter is limited for accommodations, we will give you the choice of parole, with two boats to return to the fleet, or you will risk the guns of the blockading squadron as we run into Mobile, and probable confinement for an indefinite period. We give you your choice, with twenty minutes' time to decide the matter."

During the time all hands were busy making preparations for a continuous run into Mobile or have the boat sunk under us. At the end of the twenty minutes, the prisoners, without exception, decided to give their parole and take the boats and return to the Mississippi River. After their departure we continued on among the islands until we reached Mississippi Sound, and then rounded for Mobile Bay, flying the United States flag. ...

Lincoln and the Blockade.

WHEN in 1861, Thad Stevens saw President Lincoln's proclamation declaring a blockade of all the rebel ports, wrote Ben: Perley Poore, he went to Washington and told him that the blockade was a stultification of the former position of the Government in relation to the rebel States; that the ports, instead of being blockaded, should have been closed, and a sufficient number of armed revenue vessels sent out on the seas to prevent smuggling. He pointed out to him the fact that by the act of blockade we recognized the rebel States as an independent belligerent, and should thenceforth be compelled to conduct the war, not as if we were suppressing a revolt in our own States, but in accordance with the law of nations.

"Well," said Mr. Lincoln, when he had heard his remarks, "that's a fact. I see the point now, but I don't know anything about the law of nations, and I thought it was all right."

"As a lawyer, Mr. Lincoln," Stevens remarked, "I should have supposed you would have seen the difficulty at once."

"Oh, well," replied Mr. Lincoln, "I'm a good enough lawyer in a Western law court, I suppose, but we don't practice the law of nations up there, and I supposed Seward knew all about it, and I left it to him. But it's done ...

CONCORD AND DISCORD.

Dr. Talmage Preaches at the Brooklyn Tabernacle.

The Whole Universe Was Once a Complete Cadence—Discord Brought About by Sin—The Human Intellect Out of Tune—How to Restore Harmony.

BROOKLYN, Nov. 6.—The main feature in the music of the Brooklyn tabernacle is the congregational singing. To-day, after the opening song, in which all the thousands heartily participated, Prof. Browne gave on the organ Scherzo, opus 61, by Mendelssohn. The Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., expounded a chapter in the first book of Samuel, where Saul, possessed of an evil spirit, threw a javelin at David, who was playing on the harp before him, thus showing that the evil spirit does not like sacred music. The subject of the sermon was "Concord and Discord," and the text was from Job xxxviii, 6, 7: "Who laid the corner stone thereof; when the morning stars sang together?" Dr. Talmage said:

We have all seen the ceremony at the laying of the corner stone of church, asylum, or Masonic temple. Into the hollow of the stone were placed scrolls of history and important documents to be suggestive if one or two hundred years after the building should be destroyed by fire or torn down. We remember the silver trowel or iron hammer that smote the square piece of granite into sanctity. We remember some venerable man who presided, wielding the trowel or hammer. We remember also the music as the choir stood on the scattered stones and timber of the building about to be constructed. The leaves of the notebooks fluttered in the wind and were turned over with a great rustling, and we remember how the bass, baritone, tenor, contralto, and soprano voices commingled. They had for many days been rehearsing the special program, that it might be worthy of the corner stone laying.

In my text the poet of Uz calls us to a grander ceremony—the laying of the foundation of this great temple of a world. ...

[illegible]

... and it is found that the cuckoo sings in the key of D, and that the cormorant is a basso in the winged choir, yet sportsman's gun and the autumnal blast often leave them ruffled and bleeding, or dead in the meadow or forest. Paul was right, for the groan in nature drowns out the prima donnas of the sky.

Tartini, the great musical composer, dreamed one night that he made a contract with Satan, the latter to be ever in the composer's service. But one night he handed to Satan a violin, on which Diabolus played such sweet music that the composer was awakened by the emotion and tried to reproduce the sounds, and therefrom was written Tartini's most famous piece, entitled the "Devil's Sonata," a dream ingenious but faulty, for all melody descends from Heaven, and only discords ascend from hell. All hatreds, feuds, controversies, backbitings, and revenges are the devil's sonata, are diabolic fugue, are demoniac phantasy, are grand march of doom, are allegro of perdition.

But if in this world things in general are out of tune to our frail ear, how much more so to ears angelic and deific. It takes a skilled artist fully to appreciate disagreement of sound. Many have no capacity to detect a defect of musical execution, and, though there were in one bar as many offenses against harmony as could crowd in between the lower F of the bass and the higher G of the soprano, it would give them no discomfort, while on the forehead of the educated artist beads of perspiration would stand out as a result of the harrowing dissonance. While an amateur was performing on a piano and had just struck a wrong chord, John Sebastian Bach, the immortal composer, entered the room, and the amateur rose in embarrassment, and Bach rushed past the host, who stepped forward to greet him, and before the keyboard had stopped vibrating, put his adroit hand upon the keys and changed the painful inharmony into glorious cadence. Then Bach turned and gave salutation to the host who had invited him.

But the worst of all discords is moral discord. If society and the world are painfully discordant to imperfect man, what must they be to a perfect God? People try to define what sin is. It seems to me that sin is getting out of harmony with ...

... saved, accompanied by harpers with their harps, and trumpeters with their trumpets, we should hear some of the strains of Antioch, and Mount Pisgah, and Coronation, and Lenox, and St. Martin's, and Fountain, and Ariel, and Old Hundred. How they would bring to mind the praying circles, and communion days, and the Christmas festivals, and the church worship in which on earth we mingled! I have no idea that when we bid farewell to earth we are to bid farewell to all those grand old Gospel hymns which melted and raptured our souls for so many years. Now, my friends, if sin is discord and righteousness is harmony, let us get out of the one and enter the other. After our dreadful civil war was over, and in the summer of 1869, a great national peace jubilee was held in Boston, and as an elder of this church had been honored by the selection of some of his music, to be rendered on that occasion, I accompanied him to the jubilee. Forty thousand people sat and stood in the great Coliseum erected for that purpose. Thousands of wind and stringed instruments. Twelve thousand trained voices. The masterpieces of all ages rendered, hour after hour, and day after day—Handel's "Judas Maccabeus," Spohr's "Last Judgment," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," Haydn's "Creation," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Meyerbeer's "Coronation March," rolling on and up in surges that billowed against the heavens. The mighty cadence within were accompanied on the outside by the ringing of the bells of the city and cannon on the commons, in exact time with the music discharged by electricity, thundering their awful bars of a harmony that astounded all nations.

Sometimes I bowed my head and wept. Sometimes I stood up in the enchantment, and sometimes the effect was so overpowering I felt I could not endure it. When all the voices were in full chorus, and all the batons in full wave, and all the orchestra in full triumph, and a hundred anvils under mighty hammers were in full clang, and all the towers of the city rolled in their majestic sweetness, and the whole building quaked with the boom of thirty cannon, Parepa Rosa, with a voice that will never again be equaled on earth until the archangelic voice proclaims that time ...

Notes on the Lesson for November 20—"Judgment and Mercy."

[From the Chicago Standard. By Rev. J. M. Coon.]

The lesson for the above date may be found in the eleventh chapter of Matthew, from the twentieth to the thirtieth verses. Time, A. D. 28. Summer or early autumn. Place, in Galilee, probably at Capernaum.

SPECIAL MENTION.

Cho-ra-zin.—A ride of three miles westward along the shore of the sea of Galilee brought me to the ruins of a large town. It was encompassed by such a dense jungle of thorns, thistles and rank weeds, that I had to employ some shepherds to open a passage for me. Clambering to the top of a shattered wall, I was able to overlook the whole site. What a scene of desolation was that! Not a house, not a wall, not a solitary pillar remains standing. Broken columns, hewn stones, sculptured slabs of marble, and great shapeless heaps of rubbish, half concealed by thorns and briars, alone serve to mark the site of a great and rich city. The Arabian does not feed his flock there. Not a sound fell upon my ear as I stood amid these ruins, save the gentle murmur of each wave as it broke upon the pebbly beach, and the mournful sighing of the summer breeze through sun-scorched branches; yet that is the place where Chorazin once stood! Chorazin heard but rejected the words of mercy from the lips of its Lord, and he pronounced its doom.—Rev. Dr. Porter.

Bethsaida.—Views: (1) The ancient view: but one place, namely, on the western shore. This involved difficulty in explaining Mark 6: 45. (2) The usual modern view: two places, namely, "Bethsaida of Galilee," on the western shore; "Bethsaida-Julias," on the eastern shore. (3) The latest and best view: one place situated at the northern end of the lake on both sides of the inlet, being partly in Galilee, and yet on the site of Bethsaida-Julias and on the eastern shore of the lake. (Schaff.) The word Bethsaida means a house of hunting or fishing. It was once the home of Andrew and Peter, James and John, and Philip. Like Chorazin, this site is desolate, because of its rejection of Christ.

Marine Jottings.

The propeller Lawrence will make another trip.

The schooner Mocking Bird is on her last trip.

H. M. Kinney, of Traverse City, is mate on the propeller Lawrence for the balance of the season.

The Northern Michigan line have chartered two steambarges to carry freight the balance of the season.

Mr. S. S. Burke, manager of the Northern Michigan line, will visit the towns along the route this winter.

The propeller Lawrence, which arrived here Wednesday evening, laid here nearly two days wind-bound.

The steamers Roanoke and Westover, which have been carrying pig iron from Ironton, are ocean built vessels.

The steambarge Alice M. Gill, one of the N. M. line's temporary charters, was in Saturday with a big load of freight.

The schooner Florence M. Smith is laid up for the winter, after having made another good season for her owner.

The propeller City of Grand Rapids will not be sold as was expected, but will be continued on the same route next season.

Capt. Crysler, of Harbor Springs, was in town during the past week, attending to the re-caulking of the steamer Gracie Barker.

The Anchor Line steamer Arizona burned to the water's edge at Marquette on the 17th. The vessel with her cargo is an entire loss.

Work on the fast new passenger propeller for the Chicago and Little Traverse Bay line, is progressing rapidly, and she will be ready to open the season in May.

Marine men who have seen the rebuilt propeller Champlain, declare that no finer model was ever launched on fresh water. Her owners promise to make her a fine steamer.

The steamer City of Green Bay was totally destroyed by fire on the 17th, at Green Bay, Wis. No lives were lost. The boat was valued at $16,000; insured for $11,000.

An effort is being made to get the propeller Ossifrage to run in connection with the City of Grand Rapids next season, and it is rumored that Capt. H. M. Kinney, formerly mate of the Grand Rapids, will be master of her.

It is reported that the propeller Pacific was lost off Whitefish Point, Lake Superior, in the recent gale. No particulars. Later. The steamer Pacific is high and dry west of Whitefish Point, and has been abandoned by her crew.

At Frankfort one day last week, the U. S. Marshal seized the tug D. P. Hall, on a claim of the Otter Creek Lumber Co. for $1,500 for the loss of a raft of timber, Oct. 15, at Sleeping Bear Point. She was taken to Manistee, and subsequently bonded and released.

The barges Mayflower and Emerald broke away from the propeller Thomas H. Smith off Sheboygan on Sunday, and drifted to the beach. The life-saving crew saved the crew of the Mayflower, but the crew of the Emerald were in extreme peril at the time the dispatch was sent.

The following horrible ocean disaster is reported: The steamship W. A. Sholton, of the Netherlands line, on her way to New York from Rotterdam, collided with the steamer Rosa Mary, twelve miles off Dover Sunday night, and almost immediately sank. The number of lives lost is fully 120.

Ben Campbell and Joe Swailes have taken the contract to haul out and rebuild the schooner Milwaukee Belle, ashore at the head of the Beavers, and Mr. Swails leaves this week to begin the work. It will be an all winter's job. Material has been shipped from Sturgeon Bay by Leathem & Smith, who bought the wreck.

Business at Washburn's ship yard will be active this winter. A dozen of the Pine Lake Iron Co.'s scows will be re-decked and overhauled, the tugs Higgie and Bob Stephenson will be hauled out, and considerable work put on the latter. The masters of the schooners Hattie Fisher and Peoria are negotiating with Mr. W. for a rebuild, and a sailing yacht will be built for F. W. Wilcox.

The following are the clearances for the week ending yesterday:

19—Schr Peoria, 50 cords wood, 60 cords bark French & Sutton to Sheboygan.
21—Schr Mocking Bird, 125 cords wood Stripp to Milwaukee.

There washed ashore at Pentwater, on the 17th, a life preserver weighing twenty-four pounds, from the lost steamer Vernon; also a bottle with the following written on a piece of a paper bag: "The propeller Vernon is sinking now. Wee have lost our rutter and wie are rolling in the seas. Only one bote. Find this bottel * * * Led * * * will matter now. I am on a ralftt. James Marshauser, dek hand. I live Clcago."

The schooner Geo. A. Marsh came through the bridge Saturday morning, with Capt. John Freer and his come-aboard-me-boy smile, on the quarter-deck, the same as of yore. Our reporter sought an interview, and, being an old acquaintance, he talked quite freely about the McGarrigle matter. Capt. Freer is now under bail to answer to the charge of aiding the boodler to escape into Canada. When questioned by our reporter about the probable outcome of the matter, he replied: "Well, it is with me as it was with Paddy and the rent; I'm aisy."

The New Mortgage Law.

It is stated that the new mortgage law which provides means for levying taxes upon all mortgages in Michigan is a practical dead letter already, although it has not yet been put to a test, for the reason that the county Supervisors will not require the Register of Deeds in some counties, especially in the northern part of the state, to provide books in which to keep the necessary records of mortgage owners. While it is doubtful if this law is constitutional, there is no doubt that it must fail to answer the purpose designed by its framers and the Legislature which passed it; nevertheless great care was exercised in drafting it to prevent its general violation, and it can be enforced with greater ease than almost any other state law. The language of the statute is firm and imperative. It says the Supervisors shall provide the necessary books by a process clearly described, and it attaches a penalty not exceeding $50 fine against each assessing officer for every violation. It also prescribes a penalty of $100 fine for violations by the Register of Deeds. If there is a weak spot anywhere in this statute it is in its neglect to state whose duty it shall be to compel the Supervisors to obey its provisions. It says clearly that they shall do certain things, and apparently presumes they will do as directed. It says the assessors and registers shall do the specified things set forth and affixes a penalty; but suppose a Board of Supervisors neglect or refuse to order the books which the law says they shall order, what will be the result? Since they are not acting in the capacity of assessors they cannot be made liable for the individual fine of $50 provided by law for the punishment of violations by assessing officers. It appears evident that the whole Board of Supervisors cannot be fined for any neglect or refusal they may decide upon. If they refuse to order the necessary books for the use of the Register of Deeds, he might compel them to do so by making proper application to the Supreme Court, but the Register might not care to proceed to that extreme, and if be he did not, it is clear that the law would fall to the ground for want of enforcement. Very likely that is the best thing to do with it, but there are numerous counties in the state, and if it should happen that some others refused to do so, great confusion and inequality would result. If the belief is well founded that the law is unconstitutional, it would be advisable to take a test case to the Supreme court and have that body pass upon it without delay.

—Brother Dixon, of the East Jordan Enterprise, did the amende honorable in his last issue, regarding the court house fire question, by acknowledging that he was in error in charging the editor of this paper with the authorship of the insinuations against East Jordan in the dailies. He says: "We have great pleasure in withdrawing any charge we may have made, and are exceedingly glad the matter has been cleared up in this satisfactory manner. All that now remains is for him to prove himself a ditto, by withdrawing the little to previous charge of "ignorance" and "canary's brains" contained in his paragraph of the 26th ult." We hasten to do as requested, and acknowledge ourself a "ditto" of the basest sort.

Alonzo Sheldon has moved into the Jackson house and will work for the Company this winter.

A surprise by a party of young friends on Miss Lennox at the home of Duaine Parrish on Thursday evening.

We are beginning to realize how it will seem to be shut off from the outside world by six miles of ice for five months.

A night school has been organized to hold sessions twice a week. Practical penmanship and arithmetic with book-keeping are the branches considered.

Henry S. Freeman died last week after a long tedious illness. He moved on his farm on the peninsula 6 years ago, coming from Wayne county.

The H. H. society had a profitable session at the home of Mrs. Purvis on Wednesday evening. The historical paper by Miss Noyes showed careful preparation. Miss O'Neill will have the next paper.

Our usual quiet town was disturbed on Wednesday evening by the announcement that there was a wedding in town. The report was confirmed and the particulars gave the contracting parties as Mr. C. Johnson of Norwood, and Miss Kate Wagley of Eastport, sister of Mrs. Eber Burdick of this place—the ceremony performed by Rev. W. G. Clark, of Charlevoix. Yes, yes, Geo. Mack was on hand with his cow-bell band, and furnished the serenade for which he received the cigars with which to treat everybody. We heard some one say if George or Harry C. ever get married they would—would—well, just wait.

—F. J. Meech, Register of Deeds, makes the following statement concerning the burned records of his office: There were 16 Libers of deeds. Of these there will be about three libers of warranty deeds, and one-third of a liber of quit claims that can be transcribed. This is as near as can be estimated. Of mortgages there were 16 libers. Of these there are none to speak of—not enough to make one liber. There was one liber of sheriff's deeds; all destroyed. Libers 4 and 8 of mortgages were not burned. It is impossible at present to say what can be transcribed, as the parts saved cannot be handled, and there being no full libers. The estimated three libers of deeds is made up from parts of different libers that are legible. All mortgages will have to be re-recorded, and four-fifths of the deeds. The office is now fully equipped for work, and constantly employs three persons.

There seems little doubt that the crown prince of Germany will soon die from cancer in the throat. "Richard J. Oglesby, of Illinois, for President in 1888," is a still, small boom, which appears to be gathering considerable force and momentum in some sections. "Uncle Dick" has the right material in him for a first-class President, as he has recently demonstrated beyond all possibility of doubt.

Gen. Valentine Baker, who in 1875, while holding the appointment of assistant quartermaster general at Aldershot, was compelled to leave the service on being found guilty of a misdemeanor, is dead. He was 52 years old. Since his dismissal from the English service he has been a Pasha in the Turkish army, and a favorite of the Sultan.

The New York Board of Underwriters has adopted a new system of fire insurance entitled "protected risks." The plan is a simple one but the benefits are mutual. After the usual survey by an inspector the building on which insurance is desired is to be put in such a condition as will greatly lessen the liability to fire, the rates being lowered to such an extent as will make it an object to the insured to provide the necessary improvements.

—Some of the farmers of Michigan are doing their corn husking this fall with a common threshing machine. The concave is lowered and the concern thrown wide open, so to speak, the corn being fed into it stalk and all. —A prominent Supervisor informs us that the county tax this year is not as large as it was last—the percentage of tax being one mill less—but nods assent to the proposition that it is high enough this year, although not sufficiently bulky to pay the county expenses of the year. There is much sympathy felt for Mr. Cooper, and we are glad that a movement is on foot to materially aid him.

—Engineer Beardslee arrived back Saturday from Kalkaska, where he has been working on right of way for the D. C. & E. R. R. He informs us that every farmer in Antrim county over whose land the road passes has granted right of way. There are four cases in Kalkaska county of farms where right of way will have be condemned. There are also several lots in Bellaire and two in Central Lake where process of legal condemnation will have to be resorted to, as the owners are in distant parts. There is some railroad land in Antrim and Kalkaska that will have to be so dealt with. It takes 60 days to go through the course laid down for such cases, which proceedure will be taken at once. Mr. Beardslee has shown, besides marked ability, a degree of energy, which has contributed very largely to the success attained thus far.

Hang On!

If there is any one thing we are more certain of than another, it is that success will ultimately come to those who set their stake right here in this part of Northern Michigan, and hang on to it! This opinion is strengthened by a knowledge of what the past twenty hears have wrought.

It is not difficult to discern in the signs of the times that Northern Michigan has within its boundaries the natural elements of a prosperous business future. It has preserved in its forests an unbroken source of wealth, which only needs an outlet and capital to yield to its owners liberal profit, and to labor a generous reward. And after this the aftermath, which a productive soil and favorable climate guarantees to the agriculturist.

With the completion of the railroad lines in process of construction, all other needful things will come in their order.

We grant that this portion of Michigan has reached a period in its history when the wheels of progress seem to move slowly, but the fact only speaks to us of inadquate occupation for a growing population; of a lack of proper means of utilizing the wealth of resource which lies dormant at our hand.

A better condition of things for us in the near future is as certain as that good seed sown in fruitful soil will spring to a harvest. We only need to await the coming. The tide is never at the ebb but that it is followed by the flood. The fog which sometimes obscures the vision and retards progress, always rises, and the sun always seems brighter than before it was shut out.

Hang on! There will be more sick men in California and Washington Territory two years from now than there are in Northern Michigan.

Hang on!

Mrs. McCartney read a selection from Ivanhoe, touching on incidents of the same period. W. P. Brown lead a conversation on the same work. The music furnished, consisted of vocal solos by Mrs. F. Mayne and Dr. Carlstein and instrumental solos by Misses Sadie Miller and Maggie Enos. The next meeting will be held at the residence of A. T. Washburne, Main-st. Subject, King John; paper by Hon. This week will practically end up navigation between Charlevoix and Chicago and Milwaukee.

A Marquette dispatch of the 20th states that the steamer City of Traverse broke her crank pin in the great storm, and will probably lay up for the winter at Portage, Lake Superior.

The schooner Phœnix, of Manitowoc, Wis., lumber laden from Sanders City, Mich., was run into on the 24th by a Milwaukee barge, name unknown. The hold of the vessel filled in five minutes. The crew and captain were rescued.

The schooner Consuello, totally wrecked at Port Hope, was 36 years old, having been built in Cleveland in 1851. She measured 135 net tons, rated B2, and had a valuation of $1,500. She was owned in Detroit, and was well known here.

The Detroit Tribune says "we shall probably have the painful privilege of chronicling a few more lake disasters before the season closes. Human life imperilled seems to be, in the estimation of the vessel owners, a small matter to worry over in view of the mighty $ just ahead."

The three-masted schooner Stampede, Capt. D. Buchanan, was a week ago Saturday anchored off Racine when a violent gale broke her chains and she was driven up the lake. Twenty miles below Chicago the captain succeeded in beaching her. A large mastiff on the schooner was thrown overboard with a rope about his neck in the hope that he would swim ashore with it. The rope was too heavy, however, and the dog was drowned. In the meantime the Chicago life saving crew reached the scene and succeeded in getting a line to the schooner, and her crew of eight men were saved.

WILLARD A. SMITH, Editor.

CHARLEVOIX, NOV. 30, 1887.

For the purpose of promoting the study and investigation of tariff matters among the young men of America, the American Protective Tariff League offers three prizes of $250, $100, and $50 for the best essays written by students of the senior classes of colleges and universities in the United States on the topic of "Home production indispensable to a supply, at low prices, of the manufactured commodities required for the people of the United States, and adequate home production of these articles impossible without a protective tariff." The essays are not to exceed 10,000 words, and must be ready before April 1, 1888. In addition to the prizes, all other essays of positive merit will be noticed honorably, and the writers will each receive a handsome medal. The League promises to publish the leading essays, and without doubt the project will awaken much interest among studious young men in the colleges of the country. The idea is an excellent one.

An attempt is being made to excite sympathy for Captain Black, the counsel of the Chicago anarchists, who, it is said, has lost a valuable law practice, not only because he sacrificed his entire time for a year and a half to his clients, but because his course alienated so many of his friends. It is difficult to find any reason for sympathy. Capt. Black went far beyond his duty to his clients. He identified himself with their opinions, and became as blatant an anarchist as any of them. The following sentence from his funeral oration over the dead anarchists is submitted for the consideration of any who may be inclined to sympathize with the captain: "We are here beside the bodies of those who are sublime in their sacrifice, and for whom the gibbet became a glorious cross,"—with much more of the same sort of bosh. An American, an an old soldier at that, who talks in that way, deserves to lose both his law practice and his friends. Besides, an anarchist ought not to need either of these things. A law practice implies complicity with courts and governments, which are above all things wicked, and an anarchist who is an enemy of the law surely has no moral right to look to the law for support—except at the end of a rope.

A DUBUQUE dispatch says that a bomb was exploded in the Iowa Iron Works in that city Tuesday night. The works were running a night force, and of them some twenty were employed on a large boiler in the boiler-shop. They were startled by a sudden explosion some fifteen to twenty feet away on one side of the boiler. It made a terrible noise, which was heard in many parts of the city. The bomb, which was picked up, was made of inch-and-a-half gas-pipe about two feet long. One end was still intact, plugged up with a cap, and a hole in the pipe near it for a fuse. The pipe was split into several pieces. Fortunately the explosion was all in one direction—away from the men. The flooring and parts of the building were set on fire, but speedily extinguished by the men. No other damage was done. It is a miracle that there was not great loss of life. It is supposed that the bomb was thrown in at an open window.

... ing quotation from Herwegh, familiar to all socialist speakers: "We have loved long enough! Let us at last hate!" Captain Black's address was an eloquent and feeling tribute to the dead anarchists.

THE letter which Parsons, the anarchist, wrote the morning of his execution was addressed to a resident of New York City, and is as follows:

COUNTY JAIL, Nov. 11, 8 o'clock a. m.

MY DEAR COMRADE—The guard has just awakened me. I have washed my face and drank a cup of coffee. The doctor asked me if I wanted stimulants. I said no. The dear boys, Engel, Fischer, and Spies, saluted me with firm voices. Please see Sheriff Matson and take charge of my papers and letters. Please have my book on "Anarchism: Its Philosophy and Scientific Basis," put in good shape. There are millions of Americans who will want to read it. Well, my dear old comrade, the hour draws near. Cæsar kept me awake till late at night with the noise, music of hammer and saw erecting his throne, my scaffold—refinement, civilization. Matson, the Sheriff, tells me he refused to let Cæsar—the State—secrete my body, and has just got my wife's address from me to send her my remains. Magnanimous Cæsar! Good by. Hail the social revolution! Salutations to all.

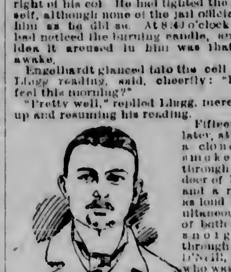
HIS OWN EXECUTIONER.

Louis Lingg Cheats the Gallows by Committing a Terrible Suicide.

He Places a Fulminating Cap in His Mouth, and Then Ignites It.

A Terrific Explosion Does the Work—His Handsome Features Horribly Mangled.

[illegible]



Louis Lingg

[illegible]

The nature of the wound was open evidence of its method of infliction. The desperate man had discharged an explosive in his mouth, with the design, doubtless, of blowing his head from his shoulders. He had failed of his complete purpose, but had succeeded in accomplishing an injury which, had it not ended in death, would have left him a living monstrosity.

Many among the men who gazed upon the dying anarchist had witnessed death and disfiguration in almost every form, but recoiled at this horror. Lingg's entire lower jaw, the upper bony palate, the teeth, tongue, glands, and all the lower structure of his head, excepting only the outer flesh, had been blown out through his lips, so that his face from his eyes down hung like a hideous sack upon which his nose was a shapeless protuberance. It was teeth, blood, bones, and flesh upon which the jailers trod and which they saw upon the walls and furniture.

In the rush of discharging matter the lips had been slit and distended so that they hung in thick, welted flaps that stirred as the blood and air from the lungs gushed through them. More frightful still, to the men who brought the first relief, he was conscious, and looking up into their faces, groaned deeply.

Lifting him as tenderly as they might in the excitement, they carried him from the cage, out of the cell hall, through the office to the bath-room, where a cot was improvised. The surgeons promptly washed out the blood-clotted cavity that was once a mouth, took up and tied several of the arteries, applied antiseptic treatment to the torn surface, enveloped the whole in bandages, and lay the hopelessly injured man back to die.

It was perhaps in keeping with his character that Lingg should face a death so horrible with composure and retain consciousness and perception of passing events until the drugs with which the surgeons filled his veins overcame him. Shortly after the dressing of his wounds had been begun he signed for pencil and paper, and as he did so it was noticed for the first time that his left hand was shattered. The thumb was broken and the flesh of his fingers lacerated.

A writing block was held for him, and with a pencil in his right hand he wrote the following: "Besser anlehnen am Rucken. Wenn ich liege kann ich nicht athmen." (Better to stay up my back; when I lie down I cannot breathe.)

With this request the surgeons complied, and raised him into a sitting posture. Time and again he signed for water, and this was administered him through a long rubber tube thrust into his throat.

The instrument with which Lingg wrought his destruction was a percussion cap. In each of the four bombs found in his cell some days before he killed himself there was one of these caps. An object so small could be concealed about the person of a man so as to baffle the closest examination. The cap consists merely of a copper shell an eighth of an inch in diameter and three-quarters of an inch long, half filled with fulminate of mercury, and with a half-inch of fuse attached. Yet this small object explodes with the detonation of a gun, and with what violence Lingg's wounds attest.

After the surgeons had dressed his gaping wounds Lingg was propped up on a rough couch in the bath-room and a heavy gray blanket was thrown over him. The surgeons had stopped the profuse flow of blood, but expressed no hope for his recovery. Hypodermic injections were made occasionally in the patient's right arm and breast and stimulants were given, but they only served to prolong a life fast ebbing away. The desperate man lived exactly seven hours after the cap had exploded.

At the sound of the explosion, Parsons, who occupied the cell adjacent to Lingg's, was on his feet, his face pressed close to the bars of his cell, and, in a loud voice, he cried:

"Give me one of those bombs. I want to do the same thing."

Parsons was still shrieking out for a companion-piece to the Lingg article when the deputies hustled him down stairs and into the jail office, where he and his fellow anarchists were thoroughly searched.

THE LIFE OF THE BOMBMAKER.

His Hatred of Society—Connection with the Great Conspiracy.

Louis Lingg was the youngest and the most reckless of the Chicago anarchists. For daring, unbridled deviltry he was without an equal. At the time the bomb was thrown he was only a little over 21 years old, and when he died was barely 23. He was a disciple of Herr Most, and his blood is on the head of his master.

Lingg was born at Mannheim, a city of about 40,000 inhabitants, in the Grand Duchy of Baden, Germany. His mother still runs a notion store in that city, and is said to be very well off. Lingg was absolutely without fear. He preached the use of dynamite and was always ready to practice what he preached. In his advocacy of force he was always far in advance of the other extreme anarchists of Chicago.

Lingg was a carpenter by trade. He joined the socialists of Mannheim while he was but a boy, and at once became an enthusiastic advocate of the doctrines of John Most. He was too radical for the socialists, and he soon found more congenial company in a group of Bakunin anarchists. It is said that he disliked moderate measures so much that he denounced his former brethren, the socialists, to the authorities, and thereby caused the arrest of many who were distributing incendiary literature. He was eventually obliged to leave his native city, and went to Switzerland, where he continued his advocacy of anarchy and opposition to everything less extreme. The socialists denounced him as a spy of the German Government, and he again had to move. August, 1885, he came to America, and within a few weeks settled in Chicago. He got employment here at his trade, and went to board with William Seliger at No. 442 Sedgwick street, Seliger being also a carpenter and an anarchist. Lingg joined the North Side group of the Internationals—an anarchist organization to which Seliger belonged. The members of this group were known to each other by numbers and not by name. Seliger was known as "79," and was Financial Secretary. The members met weekly and drilled with rifles. Engel, Fischer and Neebe belonged to the same group. Lingg at once became a leader in the advocacy of extreme measures.

Lingg spent his leisure time practicing the manufacture of bombs and shells. He melted lead in a common dipper on the cooking stove evenings and cast shells in a mold. He had practiced this business for months, closely following the instructions given in Most's "Methods of Revolutionary Warfare."

Six weeks before the Haymarket massacre Lingg brought a box of dynamite to his lodgings [illegible]

... consultation nearly the entire day. They went over the record together, examined the petitions, and discussed the decision of the Supreme Court. About noon the Governor sent for Milton Hay, whose judgment he always asks in an emergency. Just what advice Mr. Hay gave of course could not be ascertained, but it is known that they discussed the case in detail and looked at it from every side. The Governor had not finally decided what he should do until 3 o'clock in the afternoon. At that hour he sent for a stenographer, and an hour later the brief decision he concluded to make had been written. Much of the discussion during the day was as to whether a long explanation of his action should be given, but both the Attorney General and Mr. Hay are understood to have advised against that, and as this was really in line with the Governor's view, it was finally decided to simply give the points in the case as briefly as possible.

THE GOVERNOR'S DECISION.

Full Text of the Document Granting Commutation to Fielden and Schwab.

The following is the decision of Governor Oglesby:

"STATE OF ILLINOIS, EXECUTIVE OFFICE, SPRINGFIELD, Ill., Nov. 10, 1887.—On the 20th day of August, 1886, in Cook County Criminal Court, August Spies, Albert R. Parsons, Samuel Fielden, Michael Schwab, Adolph Fischer, George Engel, and Louis Lingg were found guilty by the verdict of the jury, and afterward sentenced to be hanged for the murder of Matthias J. Degan. An appeal was taken from such finding and sentence to the Supreme Court of the State. That court, upon a final hearing, and after mature deliberation, unanimously affirmed the judgment of the court below. The case now comes before me, by petition of the defendants, for consideration as Governor of the State, if the letters of Albert Parsons, Adolph Fischer, George Engel, and Louis Lingg demanding 'unconditional release,' or, as they express it, 'liberty or death,' and protesting in the strongest language against mercy or commutation of the sentence pronounced against them, can be considered petitions.

"Pardon, could it be granted, which might imply any guilt whatever upon the part of either of them, would not be such a vindication as they demand. Executive intervention upon the ground insisted upon by the four above-named persons could in no proper sense be deemed an exercise of the constitutional power to grant reprieve, commutation, and pardons unless upon the belief on my part of their entire innocence of the crime of which they stand convicted.

"A careful consideration of the evidence in the record of the trial of the parties, as well as of all alleged and claimed for them outside of the record, has failed to produce upon my mind any impression tending to impeach the verdict of the jury or judgment of the trial court or of the Supreme Court affirming the guilt of all parties. Satisfied, therefore, as I am, of their guilt, I am precluded from considering the question of commutation of the sentences of Albert R. Parsons, Adolph Fischer, George Engel, and Louis Lingg to imprisonment in the penitentiary, as they emphatically declare they will not accept such commutation.

"Samuel Fielden, Michael Schwab and August Spies unite in a petition for executive clemency. Fielden and Schwab, in addition present separate and supplementary petitions for the commutation of their sentences.

"While, as stated above, I am satisfied of the guilt of all the parties as found by the verdict of the jury, which was sustained by the judgments of the courts, a most careful consideration of the whole subject leads me to the conclusion that the sentence of the law as to Samuel Fielden and Michael Schwab may be modified as to each of them, in the interest of humanity and without violence to public justice. And as to said Samuel Fielden and Michael Schwab, the sentence is commuted to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life.

"As to all the other above named defendants, I do not feel justified in interfering with the sentence of the court. While I would gladly have come to a different conclusion in regard to the sentences of defendants August Spies, Adolph Fischer, George Engel, Albert R. Parsons, and Louis Lingg, I regret to say that under the solemn sense of the obligations of my office I have been unable to do so.

"RICHARD J. OGLESBY, Governor."

The following is a copy of the instrument officially committing the sentences of Fielden and Schwab:

"STATE OF ILLINOIS, }
"EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT. }

"Richard J. Oglesby, Governor of Illinois,—To Canute R. Matson, Sheriff of Cook County, Illinois, Greeting:

"Whereas, Samuel Fielden and Michael Schwab were convicted at the June term, A. D. 1886, of the Criminal Court of Cook County of the crime of murder, and were sentenced to be hanged; and,

"Whereas, It has been represented to me by divers good citizens of said county that said Samuel Fielden and Michael Schwab are fit and proper subjects for executive clemency:

"Now, know ye, that I, Richard J. Oglesby, Governor of Illinois, by the authority in me vested by the Constitution of this State, do by these presents commute the sentence of the said Samuel Fielden and Michael Schwab to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life.

"In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of State. Done at the city of Springfield this 10th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty seven, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and twelfth.

[SEAL.] "RICHARD J. OGLESBY, Governor.
"HENRY D. DEMENT, Secretary of State."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Notes on the Lesson for November 27—"Jesus and the Sabbath."

[From the Chicago Standard. By Rev. J. M. Coon.]

The lesson may be found in the first fourteen verses of the twelfth chapter of Matthew. Time, A. D. 28. Early summer, the time of harvest. Place, Galilee, probably at or near Capernaum.

SPECIAL MENTION.

Jewish Sabbath Rules.—On the Sabbath you must not cross a stream on stilts, for in so doing you carry the stilts; a woman must not go out with her ribbons about her unless they are part of her dress; a false tooth must not be worn; a person with toothache must not rinse his mouth with vinegar, though he might hold it awhile in his mouth and then swallow it; no one was to write two letters of the alphabet; the sick might not send for a physician; a person suffering from lumbago must not rub or foment the part affected; a tailor must not carry a needle out on Friday night, lest he should forget it, and so break the Sabbath by carrying it about on that day. (Biblical Treasury.) One might not walk upon the grass on the Sabbath, because it would be bruised, which would be a kind of threshing; nor catch a flea, which would be a kind of hunting; nor wear nailed shoes, which would be a sort of burden; nor, if he fed his chickens, suffer any wheat to lie upon the ground, lest a kernel should germinate, which would be a kind of sowing. (Abbott.)

Change from the Seventh Day to the First.—For this change the following reasons are given by Mr. Dungan in the Christian Quarterly Review:

"1. Christ rose on the first day of the week. Their hope was extinguished by the crucifixion of the Savior, and by his resurrection, they were begotten into a new hope. 1 Pet. 1: 3-5.

"2. He met with them on the evening of that day, and gave them the commission and the promise of the Holy Spirit.

"3. On the next first day he showed himself to them, satisfying the doubts of Thomas, and comforting them all.

"4. The Holy Spirit came to them on the first day of the week, to be in them and with them to the end of time. Acts 2: 1-8. All Pentecosts were on the first day of the week, as will be seen by reading Leviticus 23: 16, 17.

"5. The church of Christ began on the first day of the week. Matt. 16: 13-20; Acts 2: 1-42.

"6. The new law of the kingdom of Christ went forth on the first day of the week, from Mount Zion and Jerusalem. Jer. 31: 31-34; Is. 2: 1-3; Micah 4: 1-3; Luke 24: 46-49; Acts 2.

"7. Seeing that their love and hope was centered in the occurrences of the first day of the week, and as their work and worship was Christian, not Jewish, it would seem easy for them to give the prominence to the first day; they did, by appointing their meeting for worship on that day. Acts 20: 7; 1 Cor. 16: 1, 2.

"With all these facts before us, it is not strange that the first day of the week is called the Lord's day. It would be very strange, indeed, if they should use the term for any other than the day on which the Lord had risen from the dead and done the other mighty works of which we have spoken."

A recent article in the Homiletic Review, by Mr. Alsop, also defending the change, closes as follows:

"Put, now, all these intimations together: the strange foreshadowing in the Old Testament of a change to come, from the seventh day to the first, the honor given to the first day by the resurrection, and then by the appearance of our Lord to the disciples on the next first day, and this probable appearance on four more. Add to this the outpouring of the Holy Ghost on the first day, and the evident custom of the churches assembling on the first day of the week for purposes of worship; then John's visions at Patmos on the Lord's Day; and are you not ready, with all these intimations, to take the words of the text, and say: 'This is the day that the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it'?"

Shew-Bread.—This was unleavened bread prepared anew every Sabbath, and presented hot on the golden table, in twelve loaves of a square or oblong shape, according to the number of the tribes of Israel. Salt and incense were presented at the same time. It is supposed that the loaves were placed either in two piles or in two rows, with six loaves in each and it was called shew-bread, or bread of the face, or the bread of setting forth, because it stood continually before the Lord. The old loaves were removed every Sabbath (Lev. 24: 8), and, as a general rule, were to be eaten by the priests alone, and by them only in the court of the sanctuary (1 Sam. 21: 1-6; Ex. 25: 30).

THE CHRISTIAN SABBATH.

1. The true purpose of the Sabbath. "The Sabbath was made for man;" therefore he is under solemn obligation to use it in such a way as to advance his highest interests, and develop his truer and better self.

If we had no teaching respecting the Sabbath, we yet could infer its purpose from this single Scripture; for the term "man," whatever else it includes, surely would have reference to what was highest and best in human nature. The Sabbath was made to encourage and fortify that.

We also see the poor man's divine warrant for quiet and rest on this day. The Sabbath was made for man, all men, every man; therefore let man everywhere and always be unmolested, unrestricted, in the true observance of the day. The Sabbath is the poor man's best friend, and he should hold it tenaciously against all encroachments.

2. The true Lord of the Sabbath. Jesus declares that he himself is sovereign of the Sabbath. Certain inferences follow from this fact:

(1) The divinity of Christ. God made the Sabbath, and held it as his day; Christ is here assuming authority over it, virtually declares his equality with God.

(2) Christ has power to change the Sabbath. This is one fact it is necessary to remember in making out the Scripture warrant for the change of day. It is not improbable that Christ had that future change in mind at this very time.

(3) Man should seek to do on that day that which will please and honor the Lord of the day. While many are suggesting what should be done, or what may be done, on the Sabbath, remember that the Lord of the day has indicated clearly in his word respecting the purpose of the Sabbath and its observance. Since Christ rose on that day, let the Christlike rise in us; let all Christly things and thoughts be supreme and dominant.

(4) Christ will vindicate and protect his holy day. This thought should inspire and strengthen us in all our efforts to maintain this day of rest.

That the Sabbath has been preserved and observed to so great an extent is due largely to this direct divine watch over it. Christ is Lord of the Sabbath; and He asserts his lordship over it not to its abolishment but to its enforcement and preservation.

3. The true day to be observed. See Special Mention.

4. The true observance of the Sabbath. (1) Cessation from labor. This is conditional to the moral and spiritual benefit, and is therefore very important. If there is no day of rest there is neither the opportunity for spiritual culture, nor the ability, nor the desire. The Sabbath is a messenger from the divine presence imperatively enjoining rest. Driven by the thoughts, cares, toils of life, we come at length to the Sabbath. Weary, troubled, anxious, the feet torn by the rough places of earth, the heart panting or pained, the brain heavy and dull, we stand at the gate of the Sabbath. And God opens the gate; we enter, sit down and rest. The Sabbath of rest, how sweet it is!

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

One may work on the Sabbath to relieve human want, or to aid a suffering creature who is helpless, or to heal a man who is sick.

"Blessed are the merciful."

One should never make a case of necessity in order to gratify a selfish want.

Railroad travel for simple convenience can hardly be necessary.

Whatever leads away from Christ is Sabbath-breaking.

Jesus did not give needless offense by healing the man with the withered hand. He did no work. He only spoke.

We ought to be careful not to give offense, even where we do not think there is sin for ourselves. (Vincent.)

The Sabbath is God's day. It should be observed as his day. Beyond that no especial directions are necessary. If any question comes up as to whether it is lawful to do this or that, it can easily be solved by inquiring whether it fits in with the thought of the day. The Sabbath is meant for man—for his benefit. No gift of God, except the gift of His Son, is of more importance to man than this. It should help you both physically and spiritually. You should be the stronger and the better for it. Do not make it a day of dissipation or a day of lounging, but a day of communion with God and of help to others. Then it will indeed be a day of blessing to you. (Hayard.)

Subject of lesson for Dec. 4, "Parable of the Sower." Matt. 13: 1-9.

What Stunted the Growth of the Town.

"You wanter know what's holdin' this country back, d'ye?" said a man in Green River City, Wyo., who had a head like a woven-wire mattress which had been struck by a cyclone and rolled together as a scroll—"you ask what's holdin' it down," he continued, as he led me over by a faro table which was not in use; "you desire information as to what's retardin' its development an' causin' it to languish by the wayside, as it were? I can tell you, stranger; I can sum it up in two words an' give it to you at one dose. It is Eastern detectives—bloodhounds of the law that drag away our most successful cit'zens!

"What can you expect of a country where the Eastern detective comes in and demands requisitions for all the leadin' cit'zens? With the icy hand of the detective laid on the Mayors of our principal cities, how can our country develop? With the Pennsylvania Sheriff sneakin' up behind the President of our National Bank and identifyin' him, how can you look for progress?

"As long as one of Pinkerton's men can come into our otherwise peaceful and an' prosperous communities, look at a photograph, an' then adjust a pair of time-lock handcuffs on the principal of our schools, how can you come among us an' ask us with a holler sneer why we don't boom?

"Stranger, what is there to induce us to git up an' whoop an' develop the country, with leg-irons on the pastor of the First Baptist Church?

"Why should we invest our money in business with a Sheriff from Massachusetts an' a detective from Ohio each with separate warrants an' each on a fast hoss chasin' our Probate Judge acrost the divide?

"Why should I feel encouraged an' cheerful with the City Attorney bein' tried in North Carolina? Would you yourself feel like settlin' down in a country an' makin' a home with the Superintendent of the Union Sunday-school gittin' onto the east-bound train chained to the editor of the morning paper?"

"My friend, I don't think you would; I am pos'tive you would not, 'specially if you didn't know but what it might be your turn next, as you prob'bly would.

"This country could never become thickly and permanently settled as long as the Eastern officer who has raked up some old charge agin a prominent member of the community can walk in an' ply his vocation unrestrained by the strong arm of the law. As long as it is possible, while a meetin' of the leadin' cap'talists is bein' held to devise means of establishin' a woolen factory, or to raise a bonus for a new railroad, as long as it is possible on such an occasion, I repeat, for a paid spy from a rival town to sneak in the back door of the hall an' yell: 'Eastern detective comin'!' an' then stand and watch the President of the savin's bank an' the Circuit Judge break their legs as they fall out of the winder an' subsequently git trumped into the ground by the crowd; as long as this is poss'ble, I ag'in say, jes' so long will progress languish.

"While a man can stand in our theater an' holler 'Fire!' an' not cause anybody to look around, an' another man can stampede the audience acrost the stage by pullin' out a paper an' a pair of handcuffs, jes' so long will our nat'ral resources remain dormant, as it were.

"That, my friend, is about all I've got to say. That is about all there is to say."—Dakota Bell.

Cured by Music.

In Southern Italy the bite of the tarantula is still supposed by the ignorant peasantry to produce symptoms that are curable by music alone. In the books of twenty-five or thirty years ago this was given as a fact, says the New York Post, and from an old work the following account of the symptoms of the bite is taken:

"The bite of this creature occasions a pain which at first resembles the sting of a bee or a wasp. In a few hours the patient feels a numbness and the part affected is marked with a small, livid circle, which soon after rises into a very painful swelling; shortly after this he falls into a profound sadness; breathes with much difficulty; his pulse grows feeble, and his senses fail. At length he loses all senses and motion, and, according to some naturalists, expires unless speedily relieved. But these symptoms come on somewhat differently, according to the nature of the tarantula and the disposition of the patient. An aversion for black and blue and, on the contrary, a predilection for white and red are among the unaccountable symptoms of this disease. All the medical assistance hitherto discovered consists in some chirurgical applications to the wound and in cordials and sudorifics, which are of little service, but music—which reason, perhaps, could never have pointed out—is said to be infinitely more efficacious. No sooner has the person affected lost his sense and motion than a musician tries several times on an instrument, and when he has hit on one whose tones and modulations suit the patient, he is immediately observed to make a faint motion; his fingers begin to move in cadence, then his arms, next his legs, and by degrees his whole body; then he rises on his legs and begins to dance, his strength and activity still increasing. Some will continue dancing six hours without intermission. After this the patient is put to bed, and when he is judged sufficiently recruited from his first dance he is allured out of bed by the first tune for a second. This exercise is reiterated for several days successively, seven or eight at least, in which time the patient finds himself very much fatigued, and finally he recovers, without having the slightest recollection of having danced."

The poison of all insects is much exaggerated. The bite of the Southern tarantula may at times be fatal, but it is perhaps as much due to the physical condition of the patient as to anything else, and death from a spider bite is an extreme rarity.

Decadence of the Cattle Business.

In his annual message, the Governor of Wyoming notes the decadence of the cattle business as compared with former years, and says that the hard winters and scarcity of food are bringing about the result of confining the cattle more to one locality, where they can be sheltered and fed during the winter. The cattle, in this way, become partially domesticated and will, he thinks, increase in numbers, and the time is near at hand when there will be more cattle to the square mile in Wyoming than ever before.—Chicago Times.

THERE were 7,558 photographers in the United States in 1870 and 9,990 in 1880. There are now about 11,000 persons engaged in the business in this country.

GOOD STORIES OF STUDENTS.

A Stern Examiner Who Carried Out His Threat—Adventures of the Crib.

Among stories of examinations those that are most popular with the students are told at the expense of the examiners, says the St. James Gazette. We have two capital ones at Edinburgh. According to the first an examiner had made himself obnoxious by warning the students against putting their hats on his desk. The university in the Scottish capital is remarkable for a scarcity of cloak-rooms, and in the excitement of examination hats are, or used to be, flung down anywhere. This examiner announced one day that if he found another hat on his desk he would rip it up. Next day no hats were laid there when the students assembled. Presently, however, the examiner was called out of the room. Then some naughty undergraduate slipped from his seat, got the examiner's hat, and placed it on the desk. When the examiner re-entered the hall every eye was fixed on him. He observed the hat and a gleam of triumph shot across his face. "Gentlemen," he said, "I told you what would happen if this occurred again." Then he took his pen-knife from his pocket, opened it, and blandly cut the hat in pieces, amid loud and prolonged applause. They do say that there were other examiners in the room at the time who could have warned him had they chosen.

Another story illustrates the fact that the student may sometimes be too much for his examiner. Soon after the examination opened he was observed looking around him stealthily, as if meditating guile. From the other end of the hall the examiners watched him narrowly; so did a number of students. He took a handkerchief from his pocket and spread it over his knee. Every few minutes he lifted up the handkerchief and looked beneath it, and then wrote with renewed vigor. It seemed a clear case of copying, so an active examiner pounced upon him. The student whisked the handkerchief into his pocket. "Come, Mr. ——," said the examiner, "I must see your hanker-chief." "Certainly, sir," said the student, blandly, showing it to him. Then the pocket was searched, with no result. The student began to grin and then the other competitors, and then the other examiners followed suit. Obviously it was a practical joke, though at the time no one understood how practical. The crestfallen examiner returned to his desk and soon afterward the student took a small book from his pocket, spread it upon his knee and seemed to resume his old tactics. The fear of being "sold again" kept the examiner from interfering this time; but when they looked at his paper subsequently it was seen that his answers had come from a "crib." Whether his ingenuity availed him in the end I cannot say. A better story, in the opinion of the examiners, is one of a student who made a miniature crib for himself, meaning to smuggle it up his sleeve into the examination-room. He forgot it, however, and his mother, finding it in his room, hurried to the university with it and sent it by a messenger to the examiner, asking him to give it at once to her son, as she knew it was something very important.

Chinese Fables.

A young tiger met an old one and said: "I got hold of a man to-day whose upper parts were so tasteless and his nether parts so sour that, hungry as I was, I left him in disgust. I wonder what sort of a man that could be?" "A student who has had to buy his degree," was the reply.

The lord of hades considered a certain spirit to have been a great sinner, indeed, so he adjudged that he should re-enter the world and become a poor scholar with five children. "Is not that a rather light punishment," remonstrated an angel. "No," said his eminence. "The five hungry children will soon drive him mad."

Chang and Chung mutually agreed to start a brewery. Said Chang to Chung: "You supply the rice and I will furnish the water." "But," queried Chung, "if the profits are divided according to the capital embarked I am afraid it will be difficult to apportion your share." "Oh, I'm not afraid," said Chang; "when the brew is over give me the water, you can have the remainder."

A man was seized by a tiger. The victim's son took his bow and pursued. "Hit him in the leg," cried the father, "else you'll spoil the market value of the skin."

A bibulous individual on entering a restaurant noticed that the wine-cups were small. After seating himself he gave vent to a most demoniacal series of howls and groans. "What is the matter?" asked the startled landlord. "Ah," answered the man, "my father, a hale, hearty man, met his death at a friend's table by accidentally swallowing a small wine-cup, so whenever I see similar ones the memory of the sad event overcomes me." It is needless to add that the cup was replaced by a larger one.

A hard drinker dreamed that he had become possessed of a bottle of genuine stuff, but, determined to enjoy it thoroughly, he had begun to heat it. During the heating process he awoke. "Hoo, hoo," he groaned, "if I had known this was to happen I would have drank it cold."

A servant did not fill a guest's cup to the brim. The latter, holding it up, remarked: "This cup is too deep," and broke a piece off. "How is that?" cried the host. "If the upper part can't hold liquor, of what use is it?" was the smart retort.—Chicago Times.

Hobnobbing with Amphibians.

I was now within thirty feet of the seals. I could see they had my wind, and were getting restless; some were moving down to the water. The ringing of the church bells at Hoy in Orkney brought them in great numbers into the little bay, for they are fond of music. I recalled an old story where shipwrecked sailors enticed seals to their boat by playing on an improvised Jew's harp. I determined to try the effect of music. I tried to whistle "Yankee Doodle," but it was hard work. I could pucker all right, but there was no whistle. Three-quarters of an hour in a semi-Arctic stream only a few days from Labrador, had frozen the whistle. At this moment I heard a low, hoarse moan close by, and turning quickly saw a round black object close to my toes. I sprang up; so did the seals, very much frightened; and such a scampering! The old patriarch moved slowly between me and the herd, and was the last to take the water. Before entering he turned deliberately and gave me one look, after which I felt that if I ever got back to the mainland it would be through the courtesy of that old amphibian, who refused to injure a very sorry and unarmed man.—*A. BLUE EYES.

BY FRED A. HUNT.

"What makes your eyes so blue, my dear?"
The lover asked in the spring of the year.
"The color I caught in the mossy dell,
Where the choicest forget-me-nots do dwell."

"What makes your eyes so blue, my wife?"
The husband asked in the summer of life.
"They show the hue of the ocean deep,
Where your measureless love to my heart I keep."

"What makes your eyes so blue?" quite low,
The father asked in the autumn's glow.
"Because the pure love of our children dear Keeps them fresh and youthful from year to year."

"What makes your eyes so blue and bright?"
The old man asked in the wintry night.
"'Tis because they reflect the heaven above,
Where we shall continue our earthly love."

FORGET US NOT.

BY ANNA CERES FRITSCH.

During the silent watches of the night
Was homeward borne thy spirit on death's wings,
To that fair land where saints hosanna sing,
And pain and sorrow never cast their blight.

And though we mourn for thee and miss thee sore,
We would not wish thee back from tranquil rest;
We lay thee in thy narrow bed upon earth's breast,
Knowing that thou art only gone before.

Until we meet again, led by the hand of God
To that sweet clime where chastened spirits dwell,
Dear friend and neighbor, take our last farewell,
Forget us not in heaven, as thou art unforgot!

A MODERN MAGDALEN.

BY M. C. FARLEY.

CHAPTER XIV.—[CONTINUED.]

Miss Chidley, greatly disturbed, advances to meet the stranger. "My niece is indisposed," the spinster says hurriedly. "I am so sorry, but if you could call at another time——"

The visitor looked his disappointment. "Then I can not see her?"

"No, no. She is ill—most seriously indisposed."

His red eyes twinkle.

"To-morrow, perhaps?"

"Possibly." Miss Chidley is by no means certain in her own mind that he will ever see her niece. But it doesn't matter.

The stranger turns reluctantly toward the door. He is the same man who had visited the grave of Judith Donithorne a few days previous. "I am greatly disappointed," he says, casting a lingering glance about the room. "My great desire being to learn from Miss Lafarge the particulars of the death and burial of a lady whom she befriended at the time of the late railway accident. I may not be in this locality again for some time."

Miss Chidley really hopes he will never be in her locality again. But she doesn't say so. She says instead, and knowing perfectly well that there is no possibility of such a thing:

"My dear Marion may be recovered sufficiently in a few hours to grant you an interview. She would be delighted, I know, to give you all the information she can. The lady's death was very sad."

"Yes," assents the visitor, with another twinkle of his red eyes, "very sad, indeed."

Then he bows himself out, and Miss Chidley hastens to the assistance of Miss Lafarge.

CHAPTER XV.

THE BUTLER'S PLOT.

ON second thought Mr. Bolton decides there is no very pressing reason for his immediate return to the stuffy back bedroom in his city boarding-house. The airy country inn, in which he has established himself pending his contemplated negotiation with the powers that be, at Bywater Park, is by all odds to be preferred to Mrs. McGillicuddy's fourth-rate lodging-house. The expense of living is no greater, and summer in the country is delightful.

Mr. Bolton already feels invigorated and refreshed by the change. If a short sojourn in the country has done done him good, a longer one will do him still more good. Therefore, though he retires at night with the notion in his head of his speedy departure in the morning, yet the morning dawns and finds him with this idea entirely dispelled from his mind.

Mr. Bolton's first thought is of the roll of money the butler has given him. He hastens to assure himself that the whole transaction enacted in the Park grounds the previous evening is no wild chimera, or shadow of a dream, by drawing the roll of bills from their place of concealment beneath his pillow and looking them over.

"I may as well remain here for a short time," says Mr. Bolton, who finds it a matter of conscience to always pander to his own desires. "Madam Dundas need not know that I am within a thousand miles of her, and I'll keep shady. For Loo's sake as well as for my own, it may be as well for me to remain in this neighborhood for a while, anyway; and here's money enough, if I am careful, to last until Madam comes down with that promised salary."

The truth is, Frederic Bolton feels a strong desire to once more be looked upon as "somebody," or as an attache to the court of somebody. Madam Dundas is the great lady of the country side, and this Bolton is quite well aware of.

Madam might and did ignore her relationship to Frederic Bolton; but Frederic Bolton never forgot, and allowed nobody else to forget, the fact of his relationship to Madam.

In the country, where everybody knows everybody else, Bolton's claims upon the mistress of Bywater Park were admitted, and he was treated with deference and respect by the country people. This was soothing to his self-love, and created a desire in him to continue on in this congenial atmosphere. Moreover, Mr. Bolton was a little anxious to make the better acquaintance of Captain Hazard, and to find out, if possible, the exact conditions of Madam Dundas' will.

He was a good deal annoyed to find the man Searth domiciled at Bywater Park. Searth was an old offender, as Bolton had cause to know, and there was a doubt still in Bolton's mind about the genuineness of the butler's alleged repentance and change of life.

He believed Searth's presence boded no good to the inmates of Bywater Park. If Searth really had reformed, a little surveillance could do him no possible harm. While if he was up to his old tricks, the watch set upon his movements might result in positive benefit to Madam's household.

Viewing the subject all around, Bolton decided that upon the whole the best thing to do was to remain where he was for the present, with an eye upon the comers and goers at Bywater Park. By this course of conduct he was certain to please himself at any rate, and possibly he might be the means of doing Madam a good turn, which would result in winning the old lady's forgiveness. This being his view of the case, Bolton made himself content. He knew better than to intrude upon the household at Bywater. To intrude upon Madam was to ruin everything.

Still, having made up his mind to act the part of a watchdog, Mr. Bolton was faithful to the character, and thereafter, if Madam goes out in her carriage, or walks in the park, or receives a visitor, Mr. Bolton sees it. No movement of the Bywater household escapes the watchful Bolton. If Loo rides out with the Captain, or walks with her aunt, or sits mooning under the trees, she may be sure the observant eyes of her father are upon her.

It is only in the motions of the butler that Mr. Bolton feels curiosity and suspicion; and his curiosity and suspicion rather increase than diminish as the days go by.

The Tuesday appointed for Madam's party arrives, and, watch closely as he will, still nothing is done by the butler to warrant Bolton's open condemnation.

On Tuesday morning the light wagon is driven from Bywater Park to the bank, half a mile distant, presently returning with a strong, square box that is heavily clamped and barred with iron.

"The Bywater plate," Bolton says to himself, as the vehicle trundles past him, and his eyes light upon the box. "Madam is doing the thing in regularly swell style. There goes the family silver, and it is valuable."

Mr. Bolton's eyes follow the box lovingly, as the wagon disappears through the Park gates.

Then he turns about, fetching a long sigh as his mind reverts again to the box of silver and the ease it would buy for him were it his own, and converted into cash.

As he turns away, his eyes fall upon the short, squat figure of a man who is walking hurriedly in the shadow of the trees.

Bolton's first impulse is to follow him, and he yields to the impulse.

The stranger is some little way in advance of Bolton, and he walks with a peculiar, cat-like, and gliding motion.

Bolton follows on slowly and carefully, and is astonished to see the stranger pause at a small side gate in the stone wall—a gate that has long been disused by the Bywater Park household. A chain that has grown rusty from disuse fastens the gate to a post in the wall.

Bolton wonders how the man will remove this rusty chain, but soon sees that neither the gate nor the chain itself is a bar to his ingress.

The stranger's next movement proves that he is no stranger to the correct management of this half-forgotten gate, for he whips out a key from his pocket, fits the key in the padlock which fastens the gate and chain together, and, presto! the gate opens easily, and he disappears at the inner side of the stone wall.

Bolton wonders. He cautiously approaches the gate and listens as the low murmur of voices on the other side of the wall is borne to his ear.

There is a crevice in the high stone wall which shuts Bywater Park from the public road. To this crevice Bolton applies his eyes. He sees two figures standing near each other on the opposite side of the wall. One of the men is the party who has just passed through the gate. The other—there is no mistake—is the rascally butler at Bywater Park.

Bolton instantly recognizes the slim, black-robed figure of Searth, and all his dormant distrust is at once aroused. He feels certain Searth is plotting mischief, and as if to dispel even the shadow of doubt from his mind, the first low words which fall upon his ears reveal the purpose of the two plotters before him.

"Yes," the butler is saying, "the plate arrived just now. It is worth a fortune, and must be bagged to-night or not at all. Madam has had it brought down from the bank for the party. To-morrow it will go back again. So to-night is the time."

"About what hour?" asks his confederate.

"The party is to break up at one o'clock. At two the guests will all be gone, and by three the household will be in bed and sound asleep. Say at half-past three. I am to sit up and watch the plate, which will be stored in the butler's pantry as soon as the guests are gone. At half-past three you must have the wagon ready at the side gate here, and the plate will be ready. It's easy enough."

"Yes," the short man says, with a chuckle, "easy enough, that's certain."

"Well, well," gasps Bolton under his breath, "this beats me. Of all the villains I ever heard of, this precious pair beats them all."

"I don't care a straw," Searth continues fiercely, "for any of the folks at Bywater. I'd rather rob them than not. Folks that have must lose, you know. And I particularly desire those people to lose. I hate the young lady. She knew me the minute she put her peepers on me, and I've expected daily to be denounced by her."

"Maybe we might carry off the young lady herself," says the other.

"No; she would be a trouble. The silver is enough. I'd like to give her a little crack on the head, though, just to remember me by. And maybe I will."

"He means Loo," thinks Bolton, as he gathers himself up in a bunch against the wall. "Let him so much as lift a finger against a hair of Loo's head, and it will be all day with Searth, or whatever he calls himself."

The two villains now walked slowly along, still conversing, but in so low a tone that Bolton failed to catch their words.

He had heard enough, however, to enable him to frustrate their designs, and this he meant to do. They must not suspect that a listener had overheard their plot. Bolton realized this, and at once moved off down the road.

He was puzzled at first about the proper thing to do. But a moment's reflection decided him upon a course of action. He went directly to the village, and, hunting up the village constable, laid the matter before him. This official determined to notify Captain Hazard of the intended robbery, and then proceeded to lay a plan by which the villains should be taken in the very act.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE ROBBERY.

BYWATER PARK is brilliantly illuminated. Twinkling lights from myriads of Chinese lanterns dot the grounds, and floods of light stream from the long windows of the house itself. The guests are arriving, and the roll of carriage wheels along the graveled drive is incessant.

Captain Hazard has suggested to Madam that the ordinary staff at Bywater Park is quite inadequate to meet the requirements of the occasion, and a number of trained waiters from a neighboring city arrive in time to help serve the supper. The appearance of this addition to the usual staff rather nonpluses the worthy butler at first. But Captain Hazard remarks casually that he sent for them at the last moment, entirely upon his own responsibility, knowing that the help kept by Madam would be unworthy so skillful a chef as the butler himself, and Kibbey's suspicions—if suspicions they are—at once subside.

The Captain knew, if Kibbey did not, that the new waiters were only so many policemen in disguise. But this was something the Captain felt justified in keeping entirely to himself. He did not even take Madam Dundas into his confidence on this point.

Very stately and dignified in her black satin and point lace, Madam stands in the great drawing-room and receives her guests. Loo stands beside her aunt, and there are presentations and speeches, and flowers and music and dancing. Loo's poor head is in a whirl, but she bears the ordeal very well and acquits herself creditably, even in Madam's critical judgment.

Miss Lafarge arrives late. She is fairly dazzling in silver gauze and pearls, with all her beautiful blonde hair curled and coiled upon her head in the most bewitching fashion imaginable. Straightway she forces the Captain to come to her side, and here she keeps him.

Loo sulks a little; then she thinks better of it, and being really a girl of some spirit treats her rival to a glance that is intended to be scornful, accepts Littlefield's arm and whirls away among the dancers.

So the hours go by. Midnight comes. Madam has long since excused herself and gone to lie down on the cushions in the alcove behind the long curtains in the supper-room. She will not retire. Notwithstanding her great age, Madam's notions of what is due her guests will not allow her to seek the privacy of her own room until the last carriage has rolled away, and the last guest paid his parting devoirs.

Still, she must rest. So she quietly makes her way into the alcove, unperceived by any one, not even by the sharp-eyed Kibbey himself.

Captain Hazard exerts himself to entertain the guests—particularly Miss Lafarge, Loo thinks, jealously. And Miss Lafarge accepts his attentions with becoming grace. She smiles up into his eyes and beams upon him in such a manner that more than one thinks the future mistress of Bywater Park will not be very hard to find when the right time comes.

All this, however, is going on above stairs.

THE DUTY OF PARENTS.

Dr. Talmage's Discourse at the Tabernacle.

The Extremes of Discipline and Leniency—Children as Often Ruined by Indulgence as by Tyranny—The Proper Treatment of the Young.

BROOKLYN, Nov. 13.—The weekly publication of Dr. Talmage's sermons is beyond parallel. Beside the English speaking nations, including Australia and New Zealand, the sermons are regularly translated into the languages of Germany, France, Italy, Denmark, Norway, Russia, and India. The gentlemen having in charge the publication of these sermons inform us that in this country, every week, 14,500,000 copies of the entire sermon are printed, and about 1,000,000 in other lands, making over 17,000,000 per week. A similar arrangement is now being made for the publication of Dr. Talmage's Friday evening talks.

The subject of the sermon to-day was "Parental Blunders," and the text was I. Samuel iv, 18: "He fell from off the seat backward by the side of the gate, and his neck brake, and he died; for he was an old man, and heavy." Dr. Talmage said:

This is the end of a long story of parental neglect. Judge Eli was a good man, but he let his two boys, Hophni and Phinehas, do as they pleased, and through over indulgence they went to ruin. The blind old Judge, 98 years of age, is seated at the gate waiting for the news of an important battle in which his two sons were at the front. An express is coming with tidings from the battle. This blind nonogenarian puts his hand behind his ear and listens and cries. "What meaneth the noise of this tumult?" An excited messenger, all out of breath with the speed, said to him: "Our army is defeated. The sacred chest, called the ark, is captured, and your sons are dead on the field." No wonder the father fainted and expired. The domestic tragedy in which these two sons were the tragedians had finished its fifth and last act. "He fell from off the seat backward by the side of the gate and his neck brake, and he died; for he was an old man, and heavy."

Eli had made an awful mistake in regard to his children. The Bible distinctly says: "His sons made themselves vile and he restrained them not." Oh, the 10,000 mistakes in rearing children, mistakes of parents, mistakes of teachers in day school and Sabbath classes, mistakes which we all make. Will it not be useful to consider them?

This country is going to be conquered by a great army, compared with which that of Baldwin I., and Xerxes, and Alexander, and Grant, and Lee, all put together, were in numbers insignificant. They will capture all our pulpits, storehouses, factories, and halls of legislation, all our shipping, all our wealth, and all our honors. They will take possession of all authority, from the United States presidency down to the humblest constabulary—of everything between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. They are on the march now, and they halt neither day nor night. They will soon be here, and all the present active population of this country must surrender and give way. I refer to the great army of children. Whether they shall take possession of everything for good or for bad depends upon the style of preparation through which they pass on their way from cradle to throne. Cicero acknowledges he kept in his desk a collection of prefaces for books, which prefaces he could at any time attach to anything he wanted to publish for himself or others; and parents and teachers have all prepared the preface of every young life under their charge, and not only the preface, but the appendix, whether the volume be a poem or a farce. Families, and schools, and legislatures are in our day busily engaged in discussing what is the best mode of educating children. Before this question almost every other dwindles into insignificance, while dependent upon its proper solution is the welfare of governments and ages eternal. Macaulay tells of the war which Frederick II. made against Queen Maria Theresa. And one day she appeared before the august diet, wearing mourning for her father, and held up in her arms before them her child, the Archduke. This so wrought upon the officers and deputies of the people that with half-drawn swords they broke forth in the war cry, "Let us die for our queen, Maria Theresa!" So, this morning, realizing that the boy of to-day is to be the ruler of the future, the popular sovereign, I hold him before the American people to arouse their enthusiasm in his behalf and to evoke their oath for his defense, his education, and his sublime destiny.

If a parent, you will remember when you were aroused to these great responsibilities, and when you found that you had not done all required after you had admired the tiny hands, and the glossy hair, and the bright eyes that lay in the cradle, you suddenly remembered that that hand would yet be raised to bless the world with its benediction, or to smite it with a curse. In Ariosto's great poem there is a character called Ruggiero, who has a shield of insufferable splendor, but it is kept veiled save on certain occasions, and when uncovered it startled and overwhelmed its beholder, who before had no suspicion of its brightness. My hope to-day is to uncover the destiny of your child or student, about which you may have no special appreciation, and flash upon you the splendors of its immortal nature. Behold the shield and the sword of its coming conflict!

I propose in this discourse to set forth what I consider to be some of the errors prevalent in the training of children.

First: I remark that many err in too great severity or too great leniency of family government. Between parental tyranny and ruinous laxativeness of discipline there is a medium. Sometimes the father errs on one side, and the mother on the other side. Good family government is all important. Anarchy and misrule in the domestic circle is the forerunner of anarchy and misrule in the State. What a repulsive spectacle is a home without order or discipline, disobedience and impudence, and anger and falsehood lifting their horrid front in the place which should be consecrated to all that is holy and peaceful and beautiful. In the attempt to avoid all this, and bring the children under proper laws and regulations, parents have sometimes carried themselves with great rigor. John Howard, who was merciful to the prisons and lazarettos, was merciless in the treatment of his children. John Milton knew everything but how to train his family. Severe and unreasonable was he in his carriage toward them. He made them read to him in four or five languages, but would not allow them to learn any of them, for he said that one tongue was enough for a woman. Their reading was mechanical drudgery, when, if they had understood the languages they read, the employment of reading might have been a luxury. No wonder his children despised him, and stealthily sold his books, and hoped for his death. In all ages there has been need of a society for the prevention of cruelty to children. When Barbara was put to death by her father because she had countermanded his order, and had three windows put in a room instead of two, this cruel parent was a type of many who have acted the Nero and the Robespierre in the home circle. The heart sickens at what you sometimes see, even in families that pretend to be Christian—perpetual scolding, and hair pulling, and ear boxing, and thumping, and stamping, and fault finding, and teasing, until the children are vexed beyond bounds and growl in the sleeve, and pout, and rebel, and vow within themselves that in after days they will retaliate for the cruelties practiced. Many a home has become as full of dispute as was the home of John O'Groat, who built his home at the most northerly point in Great Britain. And tradition says that the house had eight windows, and eight doors, and a table of eight sides, because he had eight children and the only way to keep them out of bitter quarrel was to have a separate appointment for each one of them.

That child's nature is too delicate to be worked upon by sledge hammer, and gouge, and pile driver. Such fierce lashing, instead of breaking the high mettle to bit and trace, will make it dash off the more uncontrollable. Many seem to think that children are flax—not fit for use till they have been hatcheled and swingled. Some one talking to a child said: "I wonder what makes that tree out there so crooked." The child replied: "I suppose it was trod upon while it was young." In some families all the discipline is concentrated upon one child's head. If anything is done wrong, the supposition is that George did it. He broke the latch. He left open the gate. He hacked the banisters. He whittled sticks on the carpets. And George shall be the scapegoat for all domestic misunderstandings and suspicions. If things get wrong in the culinary department, in comes the mother and says, angrily: "Where is George?" If business matters are perplexing at the store, in comes the father at night and says, angrily: "Where is George?" In many a household there is such a one singled out for suspicion and castigation. All the sweet flowers of his soul blasted under this perpetual northeast storm, he curses the day in which he was born. Safer the child in an ark of bulrushes on the Nile, among crocodiles, than in an elegant mansion, amid such domestic gorgons. A mother was passing along the street one day, and came up to her little child, who did not see her approach, and her child was saying to her playmate: "You good-for-nothing little scamp, you come right into the house this minute or I will beat you till the skin comes off." The mother broke in, saying: "Why, Lizzie, I am surprised to hear you talk like that to any one!" "Oh," said the child, "I was only playing, and he is my little boy, and I am scolding him, as you did me this morning." Children are apt to be echoes of their parents.

Safer in a Bethlehem manger among cattle and camels with gentle Mary to watch the little innocent than the most extravagant nursery, over which God's star of peace never stood. The trapper extinguishes the flames on the prairie by fighting fire with fire, but you cannot, with the fire of your own disposition, put out the fire of a child's disposition.

Yet we may rush to the other extreme and rule children by too great leniency. The surgeon is not unkind because, notwithstanding the resistance of his patient, he goes straight on with firm hand and unfaltering heart to take off the gangrene. Nor is the parent less affectionate and faithful because, notwithstanding all violent remonstrances on the part of the child, he with the firmest discipline advances to the cutting off of its evil inclinations. The Bible says: "Chasten thy son while there is hope, and let not thy soul spare for his crying." Childish rage unchecked will, after a while, become a hurricane. Childish petulance will grow up into misanthropy. Childish rebellion will develop into the lawlessness of riot and sedition. If you would ruin the child, dance to his every caprice and stuff him with confectionery. Before you are aware of it that boy of 6 years will go down the street, a cigar in his mouth and ready on any corner with his comrades to compare pugilistic attainments. The parent who allows the child to grow up without ever having learned the great duty of obedience and submission has prepared a cup of burning gall for his own lips and appalling destruction for his descendant. Remember Eli and his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas.

A second error prevalent in the training of children is a laying out of a theory and following it without arranging it to varieties of disposition. In every family you will find striking differences of temperament. This child is too timid, and that too bold, and this too miserly, and that too wasteful; this too inactive and that too boistrous. Now, the farmer who should plant corn and wheat and turnips in just the same way, then put them through one hopper and grind them in the same mill, would not be so much of a fool as the parent who should attempt to discipline and educate all their children in the same manner. It needs a skillful hand to adjust these checks and balances. The rigidity of government which is necessary to hold in this impetuous nature would utterly crush that flexile disposition, while the gentle reproof that would suffice for the latter would, when used on the former, be like attempting to hold a champing Bucephalus with reins of gossamer. God gives us in the disposition of each child a hint as to how we ought to train him, and, as God in the mental structure of our children indicates what mode of training is the best, he also indicates in the disposition their future occupation. Do not write down that child as dull because it may not now be as brilliant as your other children or as those of your neighbor. Some of the mightiest men and women of the centuries had a stupid childhood. Thomas Aquinas was called at school "the dumb ox," but afterwards demonstrated his sanctified genius and was called "the angel of the schools" and "the eagle of Brittany." Kindness and patience with a child will conquer almost anything, and they are virtues so Christianlike that they are inspiring to look at. John Wesley's kiss of a child on the pulpit stairs turned Matthias Joyce from a profligate into a flaming evangel.

The third error prevalent in the training of children is the one sided development of either the physical, intellectual, or moral nature at the expense of the others. Those, for instance, greatly mistake who, while they are faithful in the intellectual and moral culture of children, forget the physical. The bright eyes half quenched by night study, the cramped chest that comes from too much bending over school-desks, the weak side resulting from sedentariness of habit, the pale cheeks and the gaunt bodies of multitudes of children attest that physical development does not always go along with intellectual and moral. How do you suppose all those treasures of knowledge the child gets will look in shattered casket? And how much will you give for the wealthiest cargo when it is put into a leaky ship? How can that bright, sharp blade of a child's attainments be wielded without any handle? What are brains worth without shoulders to carry them? What is a child with magnificent mind but an exhausted body? Better that a young man of 21 go forth into the world without knowing A from Z, if he have health of body and energy to push his way through the world, than at 21 to enter upon active life, his head stuffed with Socrates, and Herodotus, and Bacon, and La Place, but no physical force to sustain him in the shock of earthly conflicts. From this infinite blunder of parents how many have come out in life with a genius that could have piled Ossa upon Pelion, and mounted upon them to scale the Heavens, and have laid down panting with physical exhaustion before a mole hill. They who might have thrilled senates and marshaled armies and startled the world with the shock of their scientific batteries, have passed their lives in picking up prescriptions for indigestion. They owned all the thunderbolts of Jupiter, but could not get out of their rocking chair to use them. George Washington in early life was a poor speller, and spelled hat h-a-double-t, and a ream of paper he spelled "rheam," but he knew enough to spell out the independence of this country from foreign oppression. The knowledge of the schools is important, but there are other things quite as important.

Just as great is the wrong done when the mind is cultivated and the heart neglected. The youth of this day are seldom denied any scholarly attainments. Our schools and seminaries are ever growing in efficiency, and the students are conducted through all the realms of philosophy, and art, and language, and mathematics. The most hereditary obtuseness gives way before the onslaught of adroit instructors. But there is a development of infinite importance which mathematics and the dead languages cannot affect. The more mental power the more capacity for evil unless coupled with religious restraint. You discover what terrible power for evil unsanctified genius possesses when you see Scaliger with his scathing denunciations assaulting the best man of his time, and Blount and Spinoza and Bolingbroke leading their hosts of followers into all-consuming fires of skepticism and infidelity. [illegible]

CHARLEVOIX, NOV 30, 1887.

General and Political.

How would "Dickinson & Cleveland" do for a Democratic Presidential ticket next year.

Probably nothing would subdue Herr Most more thoroughly than steady work for a few years in the employ of the state of New York.

Barnum's greatest show on earth was totally destroyed by fire, in its winter quarters at Bridgeport, Conn., last week, entailing a loss of $1,000,000, with $600,000 insurance.

France seems to be in serious trouble. President Grevy has resigned for reasons growing out of official scandals, and intrigues are numerous. There is good reasons for believing that the Republic in France is short-lived.

The democrats cannot forget Foraker. A few weeks ago they were beating him out of sight for governor, just to please the Clevelands, and now they are running him for president on the republican ticket and beating him again.

Ex Senator Jones, of Florida, who for a prolonged period abandoned his important duties in the senate in order to harass some luckless lady-love at Detroit, is still in the city of the straits, and is reduced to a condition of absolute beggary. He has long seemed a perfect proper candidate for an insane asylum.

Attorney General Taggart has given it as his opinion that under the new marriage license law clergymen and magistrates may marry parties from other states without a license and without subjecting themselves to any penalty and that such marriages will be legal. Also that a marriage without a license is valid for everybody.

Mr. R. G. Peters, the millionaire lumberman of Manistee, and "Co." of the firm of Arthur Meigs & Co. has a bonanza in his North Shore silver property, as the output of his mine, which is now handled by the Aurora Smelting Works at Aurora, Ill., amounts to the snug sum of $30,000 a month, and the ore averages about $1,500 to the ton, and keeps increasing in richness as they get deeper down into the vein.

It the Ohio republicans will only make as much gain next year over this as they did in 1884 over 1883, they will give the republican candidate for president one of the handsomest majorities ever seen in the Buckeye state. The democrats had a plurality in 1883 of 12,629, but Blaine had 31,852 the following year. The democratic editors may cipher out, by the rule of three, what, at this rate of increase, the republican plurality should be next year, having been 25,000 this year.

The following extract from an interview with Mrs. Van Zandt, the proxy mother-in-law of the late August Spies, indicates that Nina is not the only member of the family who is of unsound mind. Mrs. Van Zandt is reported as saying: "Oh, it has seemed to me that if there were such a thing as chivalry in this country the men of America would not permit a man loved as August was to go to the gallows. Nina thought that—she hoped that almost to the last—but how rude has been the awakening. Such a thing would never have been permitted in New York or Philadelphia, I am sure. But western men are such savages. They are wild beasts. Why, if my daughter should recover I fear they will murder her because August—the leader of the workingmen—loved her."

Ironton Notes.

Now watch out for uncertain mails.

The Hunt family are about to return Georgia.

John Garland's house has received a coat of paint.

Mr. and Mrs. Hammond have returned from the south and report a pleasant visit.

Mrs. Lloyd of Boyne City, visited her daughter Mrs. Munson, on Thanksgiving.

J. H. Purvis has bought a quantity of cedar timber of Mr. Goodyear and will take it off this winter.

A Thanksgiving supper for the boys at the Congregational church was a happy time for them.

The night-school appears to be a success; the sessions are Monday and Saturday evenings at present.

We notice our merchants are almost daily receiving goods. Guess they expect to sell some this winter.

Grant Hammond has returned from Mancelona for the winter. He does not move around among his friends though on account of his afflictions. They are the same as Job's.

Norwood Notes.

Mr. Nash starts his shingle mill this week and it will run all winter.

E. A. Spaulding, who had a stroke of paralysis a few days ago is much better.

F. J. Meech and family and Dr. Chamberlain and wife, were at Norwood to hold Thanksgiving on Thursday.

Frank Pearl received by the Lawrence on her last trip, a span of dapple gray horses, which weighed 2,700 pounds.

This has been a fatal year for old people in Norwood, the death of Elmore Clark last week, makes four within the last six months.

Mr. Nash has bought the south east quarter of the south east quarter of section 30 in this town of the railroad company and will lumber from it this winter.

A New Society Game.

A Cheboygan man has invented a new game which he recommends to the public. This game is played by four persons, with a complete pack of cards, fifty three in number. Each two, sitting opposite one another, are partners. The capturing power of the cards in each suit, rank in the order named: Ace, king, queen, jack, joker, or blank card (always trump), ten, nine, eight, seven, six, five, four, three, two. The trump suit is the strongest and follow suit is the rule. When out of suit play trump, or discard. The following cards in the trump suit, are all valued at one point each, for the side that is fortunate enough to win them: Ace, king, queen, jack, joker, ten and five, total seven points. The dealer distributes the fifty-three cards, one by one, reserving the last two for himself. The three players will therefore hold thirteen cards each, while the dealer holds fourteen. This is called the dealer's percentage. The trump is determined by auction. In other words, each player undertakes to make a certain number of points, for the privilege of naming the trump. The player at the left hand of the dealer always leads off the first cards and has the first bid for trump, unless waived. After the first round, the capturing player leads off. In bidding for trump, the player at the left hand of the dealer, may say, two; the next, three; the third, four; the dealer, I pass; the first bidder, five; the second, I pass; the third, six; the dealer, who passed before, may now say seven; the first bidder, eight; the second, who passed before, may now say ten. If this bid is not raised, he (the dealer's partner) will name the trump, and the two as partners must make ten points, or more, if they can. In the event of their not being able to make the whole number of ten points, they will be set back ten points, the number bid by the second player at the left of the dealer. If their score was none before, they will now be ten in the ring. If fifteen before, they will now go back to five. This ten bid, which purchased the trump, is not credited to any one. This is termed bidding to the board, and is merely a contract to make a certain number of points, for the privilege of naming the trump. This being an auction game, the players can bid whenever and as often as they choose until the bids are closed. The seven trump cards previously named, are not the only ones that make points. When one side wins six tricks, they have a book. This book has no value but every trick won, over and above this book, counts one point. For instance, 7 tricks, one point, 8 tricks, two points, etc. Thus it will be seen that fourteen points might be made in one deal, seven points and seven tricks. Twenty-one points constitute the game. When both sides are so near 21 that they both count out, a distinction has to be made, as to the value of points. Their value is in the order named: Ace, king, queen, jack, joker, ten, five, and tricks last. Suppose that one side is 20; the other 14, the side which has 14 makes the six highest points and also makes six points in tricks. This would make their score 26. This side having 20 only takes one trick, but in taking this trick, they saved five-spot. Which side counts out? The side which saved the five will count out, because the five counts ahead of tricks. For information as to laws, penalties and the manner of playing this game two and three-handed, I refer you to Hoyle on Whist. I have practiced this game for upwards of two years, and everyone to whom I have taught it like it better than any other game of cards they ever played. This game affords plenty of amusement, and there is also plenty of skill in it. These two elements seem to be beautifully blended. There is as much skill and fun in this game as the cards are susceptible of. I commend this game to the criticism of a discerning public.

FROM "TIP" MILLER.

How Things Are at the "Point Betsey" Life Saving Station

To the Editor.

Thinking that perhaps you would like to hear from your old friend and companion in iniquity, (running the Charlevoix Sentinel,) I thought I would inform you, and through you my Charlevoix friends, that I am still on earth.

But how much longer I shall stay I am unable to say, but from all indications at present, I am liable to linger along 80 or 90 years; yet you know the Millers are a long-lived race. I have known them to get married at the advanced age of 70 or 80 years, and some of them are living yet. But I suppose it will be with me as it was with Gill's father, on the Island. He said his grandfather "lived to be 105 years old, but when he went, he went like a shot."

Well, Smith, all joking aside, I came very near getting my ears full of sand once this fall, when trying to go out to a tug which was going to a distressed vessel. The captain of the tug wanted me to go, so as to run a line from the tug to the vessel. I thought we would be unable to get out before we left the beach, but it would not do for me to show the white feather; if I did the men would have no confidence in me.

The boat was one of the Long Branch surf-boats. It was the only boat we had at the time, but I have one now that in a short time revolutionize the world in the way of surf-boats. While I am at it I will give you a description of her: The boat was modeled by Capt. D. P. Dobbins, Superintendent of the 9th L. S. District, Buffalo. She is 22 feet long, and 8 feet beam; is a self-righting, self-bailing and unsinkable boat; has suitable and sufficient ballast; bottom and top side bearings, to insure stability; is not likely to be capsized by force of sea or surf; its hold divided by bulkheads into twenty-six water-tight compartments, and packed solidly with water-proof sheet cork below, and compressed cork above; is rendered impervious to any dangerous accumulation of water-leakage, and proof against the dissabling effects of leakage, staving or bilging incident to the use of the open boats. At each end of the deck, above the water line, are turtle-backed air-cases, built with bent timber into the bow and stern, and lined with the heaviest canvas, which makes them proof against water-leakage, and also against any ordinary staving. They are designed to resist with their top-side bearings any careening or capsizing, and to aid with their buoyancy the counterweights of the ballast in maintaining the boat in its upright position in the possible event of capsizing. The cases are provided with water-tight man-hole doors. They are made capable of accommodating six or seven infirm passengers.

Such, in brief, is the Dobbins self-righting, self-baling and unsinkable surf-boat. You may think I have exaggerated the quality of this boat, but I have not. If there is anything in this world that I ought to know about it is a boat, for I have been in them since I have been able to get in and out of one—I may say born in one, for the boat was not far away at the time.

If the Vernon, Champlain, Alpena, and many more that I could mention, had been provided with these boats, there would not have been as many widows and orphans to mourn for the loved ones lost. I hope it will not be long before every steamer on the lakes will carry one of these boats and do away with the traps they now carry. I do not believe that among all the life boats on lake steamers, you can find one in ten that a man could keep clear of water for the first two or three years after being launched. With the Dobbins boat it is different. She will float and carry just the same if all the bottom plank were off her. To show you what she will do, I enclose the following, from the Buffalo Courier:

"In saving the crew of the Zach Chandler, the life-saving crew of Cleveland demonstrated in a most emphatic way that the Dobbins life-boat is all that is claimed for it. The Chandler went ashore during the terrible storm of last week, about fifteen miles east of the Cleveland station. Capt. Goodwin, the keeper, being notified by telephone, engaged a locomotive and two flat cars to take his boat, wagon and beach apparatus to Noble, a station about one and a half miles from the wreck. A shot line was fired over the vessel, but her crew were too exhausted to haul out the whip. Then the life-boat was dragged on her bottom down a bluff bank of clay and boulders to the water. In thus dragging her and launching her over the sharp rocks her bottom was badly used up—practically destroyed. Capt. Goodwin and his men knew that she would float without any bottom at all. They rowed to the vessel, the wind blowing about forty miles an hour, and tremendous seas running, and brought the exhausted sailors safely to shore. Such a test of a life-boat was probably never before made. It shows conclusively that the Dobbins boat is insubmergible, no matter how badly she may be stove. The result would have been the same if there had also been holes knocked in her sides."

She is a daisy.

HARRISON MILLER,

—The sermon of Rev. W. H. McCartney at the M. E. church Sabbath morning was on the labor question, and he dealt anarchists, socialists and labor demagogues a good many stinging blows, commending Grand Master Workman Powderly as a safe, patriotic and worthy leader. The congregation was large.

—What changes time brings to us: When the SENTINEL was established, apples were counted a high-priced luxury in the Pine Lake region. Now the best varieties are abundant at fifty cents per bushel. On the potato question we have nothing to say, for fear of our feelings getting the better of our self-control. We choose to remain silent and suffer.

—Charlevoix has an organization in the Historical Society which is an honor to the community, and a growing source of intellectual food. It has the dignity and stability which comes of age, and embraces in its membership not only the brightest but the wealthiest of our citizens, and the most talented, in literary and musical lore, of our ladies. It has a membership of about fifty, and a library of 150 volumes. Its weekly meetings, held in our most attractive homes, are feasts of historic knowledge, and musical and literary melange. We are of the opinion that the time is not far distant when the Society will have permanent quarters of its own. That it has before it a long and useful career we have no doubt.

—Sibert Ackert and Julia Mason married last evening by Rev. W. H. McCartney.

—W. C. Newman is still in East Saginaw, and his protracted absence seems to indicate that he has struck the city dads just right, and got in one or more of his bridge gates.

—A letter from R. A. Campbell to Mr. Bates, of the Herald, states that they are very pleasantly situated at Manistique, and that the new hotel which they are running is flourishing wonderfully.

—Whether Sheriff Jerrue resigns or not, Under-Sheriff Hurd will be acting-Sheriff until Jan. 1st, 1889. Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Hurd has belonged to the Jerrue regime, he is in every way capable and worthy of the position, and will make a very formidable Democratic candidate next fall. But Captain Harrison Berdan will be the next Sheriff. Paste that in your hats, gentlemen.

—The editor of the Boyne Citizen voted against prohibition, but wants a chance to vote for local option. He says: "We believe the liquor dealers of the county live up to the present law to the letter, and manage their business in as respectable a manner as is possible, but the saloons must go sooner or later, and it might just as well be now. Liquor benefits neither the individual, a town or county, state or nation." Come to think of it, these are exactly our sentiments.

—The brilliant Ironton correspondent of the Journal, who recently furnished a long article on the resources of his town, has been getting into trouble with Brother Dixon, of the East Jordan Enterprise: The editor claims that the correspondent is a plagiarist, and says: "We have only to add that nine-tenths of the production are copied verbatim et literatim from the columns of the East Jordan Enterprise of October 13th, and are the production of our own pen! and we sincerely thank the Eveline Correspondent for giving us this opportunity of seeing our efforts thus dished up second-hand in such shape as to give us an opportunity to blow our own trumpet in the manner we are now doing. Gall is a virtue.

—The High School Reading Club begins with a library of about forty-five volumes, composed of the best works of standard English and American authors. The books are of convenient and attractive size. It is designed to add to the number as may become necessary. As every book is a good one, the present supply will keep the pupils in good reading for some time. Each member is pledged to read at least one book from the library each month, and to report to the secretary other books read during the same time. Semi-monthly meetings are to be held at which an attractive program will be presented including an elocutionary exercise, music, choice selections from various authors etc. The first meeting was devoted to Longfellow, and selections for the next meeting, Dec. 13th, will be from the same author. The pupils are taking hold with zeal, and the organization promises to work good results.

—Wayne county, N. Y., will produce this year over 200,000 pounds of peppermint oil, says the Scientific American. The size of the crop is a detriment to growers, because the oil is lower than it has been for 30 years past. The usual price is $2 a pound but the present quotation is $1.80. Aside from the product in this one county in the State of New York, three counties in Michigan yield a small product. The crops in these two States comprise nearly all of the peppermint that is grown in the world. Germany produces a small quantity, but more is sent from this country to Germany than is brought this way. All the peppermint that is furnished to England, France, Russia and Austria comes from New York and Michigan. The fact has been demonstrated that Northern Michigan can successfully grow peppermint, and in several cases crops have proven profitable to the experimenter. The growing of this new crop is likely to increase here.

Two Miners Engage in a Bloody Battle in the Prize Ring—One May Die.

—A Wilkesbarre (Pa.) special says: Jack Gilmore and Ed Dennison, miners, fought a desperate prize-fight at Luzerne Borough. The fight lasted one hour and ten minutes, and forty-four rounds were passed. When the forty-fifth round was called, a constable broke into the ring and declared the men under arrest. Both were terribly punished. While the fight was in progress a dog owned by Dennison, which viewed the battle from between the legs of the bystanders, broke through the ropes, and, on seeing his master knocked to the ground, bit Gilmore in the face. The dog refused to loosen his hold, and his jaws had to be pried open by an iron bar. Dennison was taken to a coal breaker, where he was left without care and attention, and a physician called to attend him says he may die. It is said that the two quarreled over a girl, the daughter of a mining boss.

... building, says a Bridgeport telegram, and is supposed to have caught from the explosion of a watchman's lantern in the room where horses are trained for the ring. This apartment was filled with light material for bedding in the stables. In less than five minutes time, and before the doors to the animal room could be opened, the heat was too great to approach the building at the south end. The elephants were the last of the animals to sound the alarm, and their roars could be heard two blocks away. Each one of the original animals was chained to a separate post, and it was impossible for them to break loose. The lions then began to roar, and their bellowings were terrific as the flames over their heads gained headway and fire began to drop through the floor. The boss animal keeper with four workmen broke in the doors and liberated thirty elephants, taking them to an open lot. The frightened beasts formed in line, and, breaking down the high gate, marched to the street of their own accord. They then started off toward Black Rock as fast as elephants can move. The only other animals saved were three lions and two hippopotamus. The latter broke out and rushed through the crowd of spectators. The poor animal had been liberated from his cage by the flames, but not until the cage timbers had burned away did he get out. The flesh dropped off in great patches as he ran, and the sight was horrible to witness. The loss will reach nearly $1,000,000.

A LANSING (Mich.) special says: "The citizens of Leslie, in this county, believe they have among them the hangman of the Chicago anarchists. He has always been a reputable citizen, but his connection with the matter leaked out by accident, and his mysterious visits to other States are now believed to have been made for the purpose of assisting some guilty brother in leaving the world. He is believed to be a professional hangman, and his neighbors and former associates shun him as they would a leper."

A TERRIBLE wreck occurred on the Cairo, Vincennes and Chicago Line, near Vienna, Ill. Daniel Collard, Frank Barton, engineers, Dick Walker, brakeman, and a fireman named Schaffer were killed. Two or three others are reported wounded. The engines were a total wreck, together with a number of cars.

A BUTLER (Mo.) special says: "John Redford is a wealthy farmer, and suffers from defective hearing. Early Sunday evening Simon A. Waddell, of Princeton, Ill., who is visiting his brother, noticed Redford's house on fire. He rushed up to the door and endeavored to rouse the inmates, but failed. Then he forced the door in, and as he stepped into the hall was shot to death by Redford, who mistook him for a robber. Neighbors gathered, but too late to save the house, as it was burned ...

Dunlap to Go to Pittsburgh and Paul Hines to Indianapolis—Other Professional Gossip.

[CHICAGO CORRESPONDENCE.]

So much has been said as to the probable showing the Browns would make in a League championship race that the following talk with a base-ball official who is particularly well posted as to the playing strength of the different clubs may prove interesting: "Let me see," said he, when I spoke to him on the subject:

In the world's pennant series Detroit beat St. Louis ten out of fifteen games. Now, it would be a fair estimate to take the last fifteen games the Detroit team played with League clubs in their League championship series, and see how they compare with the record of the Detroits against the St. Louis team. Here is the record in question: Detroit beat Pittsburg twelve games out of the last fifteen the two teams played together, and they similarly whipped the Washingtons eleven times out of fifteen. The champions defeated the Boston team in ten games out of their last fifteen, and also the Indianapolis Club the same number, and they beat the New York team in nine out of the last fifteen. They only won seven out of the last fifteen with Philadelphia, and but six with Chicago. In view of these facts, what nonsense it is to state that the St. Louis Club would not be higher than fifth, when the lowest they would be placed on this basis would be third, throwing aside the fact that half the Detroits played ...

FAT-STOCK SHOW.

The Exhibition at Chicago the Finest and Most Attractive Yet Given.

Handsome Horses, Fat Hogs, Fine Cattle, and Prize Turkeys and Chickens.

The fat-stock show this year is the best yet given. The display of horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, and poultry is simply magnificent. The show yesterday looked as if it had been struck by a wave of temperance reform. Blue ribbons were tied to the long horns of the lazy oxen, pinned to the snowy fleece of the timid sheep, streaming from the ears of the grunting pig, and floating from the silky tail of the roadster as he pranced about the sawdust ring—everywhere appeared the bright color. Red and white ribbons were also to be seen, but blue was the favorite color, and threw all others into the shade.

The exhibition of ponies is a great attraction. Prizes were offered for the best saddle ponies, and over a dozen of the little fellows, backed by small boys, booted and spurred, galloped around the ring to the intense delight of the crowd. One of the boys toppled off his steed at the first turn, and another was thrown ...

Coroner's Verdict in the Lingg Suicide—Other Anarchistic News.

[Chicago special.]

The inquest on the body of Louis Lingg, the bomb-maker, was held at the Coroner's office on Thursday. The jury found this verdict: "We find that Louis Lingg came to his death from shock, hemorrhage, and fatty embolism of the lungs, caused by the explosion of a bomb about two inches long and half an inch in diameter, and filled with dynamite, said bomb being exploded by his own hand with suicidal intent on Nov. 10, A. D. 1887." The question as to how Lingg obtained possession of the missile is as great a mystery as ever.

The Anarchist Defense Committee state that some time will be required to enable them to ...

The harshness of his principal and a German's yearning to see the world led him away to Switzerland, where he joined the anarchists at Zurich, Basel, and St. Gall. From Switzerland he drifted to Chicago, where he fell in with August Spies. Lingg had a religious belief, but was a child of nature, and spent his Sundays in the woods and fields instead of in saloons.

He went to America principally to escape military service, as he was so good a student that there was no chance of his being dropped. He was decidedly ambitious and very anxious to adopt some profession. His devotion to his sister, a beautiful girl about 20 years old, was one of the most admirable traits of his character. After Lingg's arrival in America he worked hard and faithfully, earning $2.50 a day, three times as much as he could have earned here.

Both his mother and sister expressed satisfaction at his having killed himself. Mrs. Lingg is an honest, hard-working washer woman.

THE OTHER FIVE.

Parsons, Fischer, Engel, Schwab and Fielden.

Albert R. Parsons was born in Montgomery, Ala., June 24, 1848. His mother died when he was two years old, and his father three years later. In 1852 he went to live with his brother, Gen. W. H. Parsons, in Tyler, Texas, and was raised by him. He was apprenticed to the Galveston News in 1863, for seven years, and learned the printers' trade. When the war broke out, in 1861, he became a member of the Lone Star Grays on the Confederate side, and later on became a scout. In 1868 he went to Waco, Texas, and started The Spectator, afterward becoming connected with the Houston Daily Telegraph. It was in Houston that he met his wife and married her in 1872. He went to Chicago in 1873, and worked as a printer until he was arrested, in 1877, on account of his interference in the strikes. He ran for several offices on the Socialistic ticket, and finally started The Alarm.

Adolph Fischer was about 28 or 27 years of age, and lived in this country for the last thirteen years. He was a printer and worked at his trade while in America. For the last seven years he was a compositor on the Arbeiter-Zeitung. He was married and the father of two children.

The Veteran.

[The following poem, by Colonel Edward Jay Allen, of Pittsburg, was read at the reunion of the survivors of the One Hundred and Fifty-fifth Regiment, P. V., at Gettysburg.]

NAY, step aside, and give him space,
Whose stained and threadbare suit of blue,
And halting gait, and thin worn face,
Tell of the veteran, tried and true,
And bent out, though with vacant stare
He gives no way amid the crowd,
But presses on with absent air,
Half uttering his thoughts aloud.

For the crowded street has gone from his sight,
And the sound of his heel is the sentry's tread;
The great tall walls to the night light
Have faded away, and over his head
Is the Southern sky, and sharp and clear
The challenge rings out, "Halt! Who goes there?"
And the bayonet gleams, as he paces his round,
With the enemy camped on the hills beyond.

And the "Hurrah!" he hears again,
When the tattered flag leads the onward way,
And the minnies' scream like the whistling rain,

So interesting is the Chicora, as she is now called, and it will be a matter of such curiosity to thousands to know precisely what kind of vessel was able to successfully run the blockade, that I have taken the pains to get from her Captain all necessary particulars about her. She is a clipper built craft, sharp at the bows, sits low in the water, though a double-decker, and has a "rake" to mast and smoke-pipes. Her length out of water is 250 feet; breadth, 25 feet; depth of hold, 13 feet; gross tonnage, 931. She has double oscillating engines; cylinders 12-inch stroke, 52 inches diameter; she is double-decked, with five water-tight compartments. Bessemer steel was used in her construction. She is capable of the great speed of eighteen miles per hour. Her saloons and interior fittings are handsome, and, excepting some small changes which were necessary to fit her for her present business, the Chicora remains the same as when, in the old war days, she plowed the blue water between Nassau and Charleston, and successfully showed her light heels to the swiftest of our steam cruisers outside the harbor.

Her present name was given her after the war, when she was transferred to ...

... don't do that. I will go and see what mother says."

As we stood talking, back she came, and told us to come in and supper would be ready in a few minutes. While we were eating the woman complained bitterly about the two soldiers who had killed her pet pig. I said to her, "It was a shame for them to kill it, and if we had been here they would not have done it."

She said, "I know you'uns would not have allowed them to kill my pet pig, for you'uns look like two good, honest soldiers."

We had all that we could do to keep from laughing in the face of the old lady. When we had finished our supper I asked her if she had any corn-meal in the house. She said, "We'uns have a little that we have kept for our own use." But I told her we must have some. So she went into the pantry, brought out a panful, and said that was all she could spare. I told her we must have something to put it in, and she went to the bureau and got a pillowcase and put the meal into it.

We thanked her very kindly and started for where the boys were dressing the pet pig. Passing the barn we spied a horse tied in the stall. Thinking this just the thing to carry our pet pig back to camp, we resolved to take him. Entering the barn we found a bridle, put it on the horse, led him out of the barn, put the meal on his back and went down where the boys were. They had the pet pig ready for us to load, and we went to camp. We had plenty of rations to last us through to ...

A Talk with Senator John Sherman on Questions of the Hour.

In National Politics Republicans Should Not Be Timid, but Earnestly Aggressive.

Truth About the Tariff, Suffrage in the South, and the Treasury Surplus.

Mr. W. C. MacBride, of the Cincinnati Enquirer, visited Senator John Sherman at his home in Mansfield, Ohio, just before that gentleman left for Washington, and interviewed him at length, from which we extract the following.

Fortunate in finding Mr. Sherman at home when I made my call, I was shown into his library, where he was busy with his mail—just such a room as one given to study would covet, every wall laden with shelves of books alternated with historic prints, and here and there profiles of men distinguished in American and European public life. It required no opening pass to have my mission known. I had come to get his views, and frankly said so, and without reserve Mr. Sherman gave them. I asked Mr. Sherman first how he interpreted the lessons of the recent elections in the several States, to which he answered:

"I think the New York election has settled the renomination of Grover Cleveland, and the Republicans will be called ...

... the subject we will make a bill, but you can rest assured that it will embody the feature of protection to American labor. While on the tariff, let me give you some suggestions. The Democrats call us protectionists, whereas the fact as it is, is that the existing tariff bill, a Republican measure, is largely in the line of free trade. Of the importations now amounting to $ 300,000,000, $250,000,000 are now on the free list. This is more than a third of the articles which go to make the remaining two-thirds. Over $140,000,000 are collected from the luxuries of life—such as silks, velvets, bric-a-brac, champagne and foreign liquors. So that really less than one-third other than luxuries are now taxed. The aim ought to be to tax all foreign importations with which the American product cannot compete. Let in free goods in which America is not thrown in competition and likewise make free all the articles which are the necessaries of life. In a nutshell, let come in free everything we cannot make. Put a tax on that which we can make, so that the American manufacturer can pay his workmen better wages than are paid in Europe. This is the sum and substance of protection."

"Have you any pronounced views as to how the surplus in the Treasury should be reduced?"

"Yes," said Mr. Sherman, "I have. I would not touch the tax on distilled spirits. I would reduce or abolish wholly the tax on tobacco. I would make the tax on sugar either nominal or wipe it out entirely; if wiped out I would offer a bounty for sugar-making. This would encourage the farmers of the land to raise beet-sugar. I likewise favor the return to the States of the direct tax. Again, I would revive the distribution act of 1837. In that year Congress passed an act providing that the surplus then in the Treasury should be distributed to the several States upon the ...

Various Reports from Government Departments and Bureaus.

Condition of the Treasury—The Army and the Navy—The Postal Service.

THE TREASURY.

Synopsis of the Annual Report of Treasurer Hyatt.

The annual report of James W. Hyatt, Treasurer of the United States, shows that the revenues of the Government for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887, were $371,403,277, ordinary expenditures, $267,932,179; surplus receipts available for the reduction of the public debt, $103,471,097. As compared with the previous year the receipts increased $31,063,570, the expenditures $25,419,041, and the surplus revenues $9,514,500. There was an increase in every item of revenue, the largest being in the receipts from customs. The largest increase in the expenditures was on account of Indians and pensions, and the largest decrease on account of interest on the public debt. The receipts of the Postoffice Department amounted to $41,752,347, and the expenditures to $53,583,845. The revenues, exclusive of deficiency appropriations, increased $3,500,493, and the expenditures $2,...,210. The amount drawn from the Treasury to make good the deficiencies in the postal revenues was $6,069,131, as against $8,714,422 in 1886.

The operations of the year involved the redemption of $127,511,054 in United States bonds, of which $47,811,200 was on account of the sinking fund; the issue of nearly six hundred thousand drafts and checks, the redemption of upward of $193,000,000 in the United States paper currency and national bank notes, and the handling of $148,000,000 in the United States bonds deposited or withdrawn by the national banks.

Statements of the assets and liabilities of the Treasury are given for the close of the fiscal ...

... money be spent to give the country such a valuable return."

In conclusion the report says:

"The outlook for the navy in the near future is a very hopeful one, and with the completion of the vessels now projected the navy will consist of a number of modern vessels admirably adapted to the varied needs of the service. The character of the work being done on the vessels now building and those lately completed shows that our ship-builders are able to turn out vessels of war second to none in the world.

"The establishment of the gun factory at Washington and the construction by the Bethlehem Iron Works of a plant to furnish heavy armor and gun forgings makes the United States absolutely independent of other countries in the construction and armament of her ships of war, and if the work of rebuilding the navy is only kept up as it is now going we shall soon have a navy that will be a credit as well as a protection to our country and our country's interests."

Tables attached to the report show the exact condition of every vessel in the navy. This table shows that in three years we shall have twenty-one of the wooden vessels remaining, in six years but four, and in nine years the entire wooden navy will have disappeared.

THE POSTOFFICE.

Cost and Length of Mail Service—Free Delivery System.

The annual report of A. Leo Knott, Second Assistant Postmaster-General, shows that the total cost for the year was $... In the star service there was an increase of 233 routes and a decrease in cost of $242,517. In the mail messenger service there was an increase of 161 routes and a decrease of $...,111 in cost. In the railroad service there was an increase of 7,013 miles in length of routes and an increase in cost of $634,5... In the star and steamboat service there was an average increase in the number of miles traveled during the last year over the average of the six preceding years of 7.50 per cent., and a decrease in the cost of 13 per cent. in the star service and a decrease of 27 per cent. in the cost of the steamboat service.

The increase in the number of pieces of mail handled by the postal clerks during the last fiscal year over the preceding year was 585,000,000. The continuation of the appropriation for special mail facilities on fast lines to the South and West is recommended. The total amount of the estimates submitted to meet the requirements of the office of the Second Assistant ...

CHARLEVOIX, DEC. 7, 1887.

If Don Dickenson goes in it will be a Dickenson Administration.

Mr. Powderly, General Master workman, is to resign his position, having become heart-sick of hearing the curses of Anarchists and Socialist Knights.

Sullivan and Mitchell will fight with bare knuckles on Spanish soil. It is meet that such brutality should seek exhibition in the land where bull-fighting is an aesthetic sport.

New York Tribune: "The man who cannot see that the Republican party goes into the fight next year with very bright prospects, must be afflicted with political color-blindness.

The boom of Sault Ste. Marie is likely to be added to on the colossal plan by the recent discovery near by (on the Canada side) of ruby and gray silver quartz, carrying $500 to $3,900 per ton.

There are some pretty good republicans who think that Gen. Phil. Sheridan, as the republican nominee for president, would make Mr. Cleveland sorry he enlisted before the fight was fairly begun.

Jeff Davis may recommend applicants for government positions under Mr. Cleveland, but his communications cannot go on the department files. Democracy draws the line against treason sharply at that point.

For once the Florida papers admit that they have had cold weather. The reason for the admission is that it has put a quietus on the yellow fever. The dispatch says that there was heavy frost and thin ice at Tampa on Sunday last.

The political gossips have billed Mr. Blaine for a return trip via Japan, and inform him that he will arrive at San Francisco June 20; hour not given. The p. g's. are very good to Mr. Blaine. They made all his plans and don't charge a cent.

The drought in Ohio has been so severe that in the natural gas region oil was more plentiful than water, and low fevers present in the majority of households. In Findlay, water commanded 50 cents a barrel when oil was selling at 15 cents for a like quantity.

The republican party should declare its unalterable opposition to "the saloon in politics" (1) because it is right to do so and (2) because "the saloon in politics" is opposed to the republican party. If the democratic party cannot get along without "the saloon in politics" the republican party cannot get along with it. Its influence is evil and its power must be crushed.—Detroit Tribune.

There will be a scramble for the Presidency of the French Republic, and it has already begun. Mr. Grevy has finally determined to "step down and out," and who will step up and in is the question of the hour. The National Assembly will receive, and of course will accept, M. Grevy's resignation soon. Then that parliamentary body will undertake the election of a successor. And there will be a row.

A New York printer has invented a machine that will print a million ballots in less than a day. The ballots are not only printed rapidly, but they are delivered from the machine encased in a gummed envelope. This is a great achievement; but it will not fill the bill in the "Solid South." What they want there is a machine that will deliver the tickets into the ballot box in quantities that will offset any Republican vote that may be cast.

The fact transpires that certain Michigan railroads and corporations are now holding or have sold upwards of 300,000 acres of land to which they have had no just title, and that the suits are to be brought by the State of Michigan against the Flint and Pere Marquette, Jackson, Lansing and Saginaw, and the Grand Rapids and Indiana Railroads to recover 180,000 acres of land illegally held by them through grants of Congress.

A writer to the New York Tribune says eighteen is a fatal number for France. Louis XVI. reigned eighteen years, the first Napoleon's "military despotism" was maintained during a like period, Louis Philippe was king for eighteen years, and Napoleon III. reigned from 1852 to 1870. This writer then asks whether the existing republic, which was established in 1870, will survive the year 1888. He puts one question too many. He should have confined himself strictly to cold statistics.

A new ore dock is to be built at St. Ignace. It will extend out into the lake 1,200 feet, and will contain 150 ore pockets, each holding 80 tons. It is to be finished in time for next season's business.

Simon Ki-ji-go-be nese, his brother Charlie, Frank and Jonas Wasson, started for Washington last Wednesday, to interview the "Great Father" about alleged amounts due the Indians from the government.

"Big" McGuire and two others were arrested by the sheriff at Kalkaska, last week for stabbing the foreman of a camp south of there the Saturday night previous. The victim's name is not known. He is wounded in the left side, near the heart, and is said to be fatally injured.

One of the latest and most valuable inventions, a storage battery, has been ordered by the Petoskey electric light company, and it is expected that it will be in operation by Christmas. It will contain twelve hundred storage cells, and will store enough electricity to run five hundred lamps five hours.

The business men's association have sent to supervisors of Wexford and Missaukee counties, also parts of Osceola county, tributary to Cadillac, for estimates on amount of hardwood in their several townships, to get a thorough knowledge of resources and consequent advantages to be offered manufacturers for locations there.

On Saturday afternoon of last week, Joseph Guilmette and Henry Hintz left St. Ignace in a sail-boat for Bois Blanc Island. They should have returned that night but did not. The steamer Gazelle searched all the next day but found no traces of them. The boat had no center-board, and probably capsized in a squall. Guillmette leaves a wife and four children, Hintz a wife to whom he has been married only three months.

Judge Grant, of Marquette, has a novel way of making the law effective. On the 22d inst. he held a meeting in the opera house at Marquette, and invited all the saloon keepers in the city to attend. Nearly all of them did so; the Judge then read passages from the new liquor law, in force in Michigan, and explained the difference between the new law and the former one. He told the men what the consequences would be for a violation of the law.

East Jordan Enterprise: Frank Arno, who has a wife and two children at Atwood, and who has been doing the itinerant picture frame racket in this place for a few days, left on the stage for the station in company with Mrs. Leonard Anderson, of this town, who leaves a husband and two or three children. As Arno bought the lady in question a new hat and cloak just before starting, Mr. Anderson conceives that it is a case of elopement, and is not backward in saying so.

The libel suit of Judge C. C. Fuller against the Big Rapids Herald, recently came up in the Big Rapids circuit, with Judge Mills, of Kalamazoo, on the bench. The jury rendered a verdict for the defendent under the direction of the court. The libel charged was that the Herald accused Judge Fuller of circulating bogus tickets when running for circuit judge last spring. Counsel for defense, after the testimony was in, asked that the jury be directed to find for defense, on the ground that the published matter was not libelous and the instruction was so given.

The Canadian Pacific reached the Ontario "Soo," opposite Sault Ste. Marie, the 28th, and rails were laid to the intersection of the great northern highway. Ballasters are fifteen miles back. The road will be ready for trains Dec. 15. The Canadians celebrated the event the 29th, and later, on the completion of the bridge, a grand international jubilee will be held. The engineering corps are engaged in locating the Grand Trunk road, which arrived at the Canadian Sault the 28th, and work will soon commence on this line. The Minneapolis road will be completed to the Sault this week. The seventh span of the international bridge has been completed.

Milwaukee Wisconsin: John D. Cameron, of Sault Ste. Marie, who has been spending a few days past in Milwaukee, has during that time disposed of $50,000 worth of lots in that booming town to Milwaukee parties. He says that Milwaukee people have put more money into Sault Ste. Marie investments than those of any other city except St. Paul. Speaking of matters at Sault Ste. Marie, Mr. Cameron said: "The population is now 6,500. Of these people, some will go south, to escape the cold weather, but fully 6,000 will winter there, and the others, with numerous new settlers, will all be there before the 15th of March. Seven hundred new buildings were put up in the town during the past summer. It is not correct to speak of the town as booming. Its development, though going on at an extraordinary rate, is steady growth."

Bellaire Breeze: B. E. Fernow, Chief of the Division of Forestry, Department of Agriculture, Washington, has recently purchased $300 worth of evergreen and deciduous tree seedlings from the Snowflake [Antrim county] nurseries, which are all to be sent by mail under the direction of the Department of Agriculture, to parties interested in tree culture. W. W. Johnson, proprietor of these nurseries, has been appointed agent for this purpose by Norman J. Coleman, Commissioner of Agriculture. Under this arrangement a small quantity of these seedlings were mailed this fall, but the main bulk will be sent in the spring.——Mr. Wm. Saunders, of Ottawa, Canada, director of the experimental farms for the Dominion government, recently visited the Snowflake Nurseries and ordered for his government a bill of tree seedlings and seeds amounting to $428. These are to be planted on experimental farms which are located one in each of the Provinces.——Arch. Cameron has been appointed Treasurer of Torch Lake Township to fill the vacancy caused by the removal of Josiah Newell.——Died, Nov. 20th, at the residence of his son, William, Michael Zeran, aged 88 years. The deceased was a native of Canada, emigrated to the Saginaw Valley in 1866, and to Central Lake township in 1875, where he has since resided. He leaves a wife, with whom he has lived over 56 years, four children and many grandchildren to mourn his loss.

Petoskey Record: As has been expected for some weeks past, the Democrat has succumbed to fate, and the plant has been transferred to Mr. Hampton, of the Independent. Mrs. Dillon, the real proprietor, has plenty of means, and could doubtless have kept the paper going ad infinitum, had she chosen; but as under unwise business management it has been losing money right along, except for a couple of months or so during the summer, she concluded to let it go. We are not informed as to the intentions of Mr. Guinon or Mr. Dillon. [Mr. Guinon accepts an editorial position on the consolidation, under Mr. Hampton. It is a genuine case of Romeo and Juliet, with the chances in favor of Romeo changing the text, and exemplifying the philosophy of the survival of the fittest. Or it may be Damon and Pythias over again, with Guinon in his old role.]————About thirty ladies and gentlemen gathered at the pleasant home of Mr. H. O. Rose, on Saturday evening, the occasion being a surprise in honor of his birthday. Strong in the fact that the family bible was destroyed in the fire which consumed the old house three years ago, all blandishments failed to make Mr. Rose confess to his exact age, but, notwithstanding, he received the "guess" that he is 80 years old with as much equanimity as the one which set him down for 50. It was a very pleasant party, and Mr. Rose received the numerous good wishes and congratulations of his friends with becoming and blushing modesty. [The dear, innocent old creature.] ——On Friday night as the train from Mackinaw, arriving here at 11:5 p. m., turned into the cut just this side of Maple River bridge, the engineer saw a large buck standing in the middle of the track apparently confounded by the brilliant headlight. The train, which had not pulled up at Pellston, and had gathered speed on the down grade from the station to the bridge, shot into the cut at the rate of forty miles or more, an hour, and when the engineer saw the deer, of course he pulled the throttle wide open. The buck stood perfectly still until the engine was fifty or sixty feet away, when he wheeled and started down the track between the rails at full speed. But fleet as he was, he had no chance against iron and steam, and in a few minutes the pilot struck him and threw him into the ditch with three of his legs broken. The train was stopped and backed up and the beautiful creature put out of his misery, and loaded on the engine. He weighed something over 200 pounds.

The steamer Clara Belle made her last trip Friday.

The tug Duncan City was at this port one day last week.

The scow Lottie Mason returned from Beaver Island Saturday, and has stripped.

The schooner Hattie Fisher, of Beaver Island, is at Washburn's ship yard for repairs.

The old schooner Pearla, Capt. Hulme, arrived in port Monday morning and laid up.

The schooner Fleetwing will make another trip to Milwaukee and lay up for the winter at that port.

The tug Higgie has been hauled out at Washburn's yard, and Capt. Roberts leaves on the Lawrence for his Dakota home.

The steamer North Star broke down last week just in time to escape breaking ice at the head of South Arm, and is laid up at East Jordan.

Capt. Baldwin, late of the propeller City of Traverse, will command the new steamer being built by Seymour, for the Chicago and Harbor Springs route.

The schooner Mocking Bird arrived in port Friday, and goes into winter quarters. Capt. Madison has got around with the best of them and has had no serious misfortune.

The scow Lottie Mason cleared this port on Wednesday last week with material for the stranded schooner Milwaukee Belle, at Beaver Island, of which Ben Campbell has the contract to re-build.

Capt. Penfold, of the tug Hall, recently libeled for losing a raft, says they can't make their case stick against him. The raft was anchored in a storm and the tug sent home by the foreman to save expense. Wind shifted and stranded the raft.

The propeller Thos. Friant has laid up at Harbor Springs, after a very successful season. The Friant will always be successful so long as Capt. Vanderhoef owns and sails her. No more accommodating skipper ever sailed the "unsalted seas" than Van, and why shouldn't he be popular.

Capt. Guard, of the steamer Gordon, has done a fair business on the Pine Lake route, this season, and proposes to fix himself in better shape for next season. The present winter the Gordon will be lengthened 16 feet, and supplied with a new and stronger engine. Capt. Guard and his son, have made many friends on the route, and we hope success will follow the increase in capacity.

S. S. Burke was a passenger on the Lawrence this trip. When asked what he should name the new boat he answered that if she was not re-christened the "Champlain" she would be named "The City of Charlevoix." We regard the answer as settling the matter for the latter name. Mr. Burke informs us that they put the boilers into her last week, and that the hull will be as strong as wood and iron can make it.

Dunham's expedition which was sent to the wrecked schooner Stampede early Tuesday morning of last week returned with the vessel Wednesday, to Chicago. She is in very good condition considering that she was on the beach for ten days. Had the wreckers delayed a few hours later they might not have got the vessel, as the heavy sea that set in from the eastward would have made it impossible for the tugs to work.

S. S. Burke, half owner of the Northern Michigan Line, has taken pains to ascertain from agents the number of tickets sold to passengers for the ill-fated steamer Vernon, and now places the loss of life at forty-one. As the crew numbered twenty-two persons, of whom one was saved, the conclusion remains that twenty passengers, comprising the entire list, lost their lives. Mr. Burke gives it as his opinion that the steamer was swamped though the gangways having been burst in by the seas, and places the entire property loss at $67,000. These statements are culled from Mr. Burke's wreck report.

The most notable wrecks of the year are those of the Arizona, which burned at Marquette, entailing a loss of $75,000 on vessel and cargo; the stranding of the steamer Osceola at Port Austin, loss about $125,000; the sinking of the schooner Niagara, on Lake Superior, loss $35,000; the burning of the propeller Champlain, loss $30,000; and the foundering of the steamers California and Vernon, with a loss on the former of about $40,000, and on the latter of nearly $100,000. The Niagara took with her ten lives, and fully seventy-five persons went out of existence with the Champlain, Vernon and California. Add to these the crews of a number of sail vessels, and the unfortunates who were washed overboard from various crafts during the season, and the loss of life will foot up somewhere between 100 and 125—an aggregate perhaps a little higher than the average.

Cheboygan Tribune: The recent disaster to the propeller Albany has brought forth many reminiscences of the past, when similar accidents furnished plentiful supplies for the winter to the inhabitants of this region. One fall, some twenty years since, a schooner loaded with choice winter apples for Chicago ran aground on Little Island, and apples were a drug in this section at twenty-five cents per barrel. When the schooner Scott went ashore with her cargo of flour in the fall of '69 or '70, flour was abundant. D. R. Joslin, at that time the leading attorney of Cheboygan, thought he saw a chance to make a speculation, and arranged with the captain to look after the flour. He had search-warrants issued by a justice of the peace, and turned them over to Sheriff Gray to find the flour. Gray knew pretty well who had the flour, and made a levy of from one to three barrels on each lot, securing 60 barrels. When Joslin called on him for returns, the Sheriff told him he had only found enough to pay him for his trouble. One fall, John Barber says, there were twenty-five vessels ashore between the mouth of Little Black River and Hammond's Bay. Another fall a vessel with a cargo of whiskey went ashore on Lighthouse point. The whisky was recovered and stored in the Duncan Bay warehouse. During the winter, when any person's supply of whisky ran short, they would take a pail and an augur and get under the warehouse, bore a hole up through the floor into a barrel, and fill their pail. In the spring about every barrel on the floor of the warehouse was empty.

Historical Society.

The parlors of Mr. and Mrs. A. T. Washburn were crowded last Friday evening by the members and friends of the Charlevoix Historical Society. The subject of the evening was "King John." Hon. John Nicholls read an able paper on the "Life and Times" of that monarch, giving a comprehensive review of the events preceding and attending his reign. The other exercises of the occasion consisted of a piano duett by Mrs. Kane and Miss Cochran, which was repeated by special request; a vocal solo by Mrs. E. M. Clark; a vocal duett by W. A. Smith and daughter Florence; a reading of "Darius Green and his Flying Machine," with illustrations, by A. T. Washburn, and a selection from Shakspeare's "King John," by Prof. H. M. Enos. The exercises were enjoyed by all. The Librarian reported about sixty new books added to the library. The next meeting will be at the residence of E. M. Clark, Friday evening of this week. Subject: "Conquest of Ireland;" paper by R. W. Kane.

Our Holiday Advertisers.

In this and the next two issues of the SENTINEL dealers in holiday goods are generous in the use of its advertising columns. They know that special advertising for the holiday trade pays, and that the SENTINEL not only gets up an attractive advertisement, but reaches more readers than any other paper in the county.

A. T. WASHBURN & CO.,

on the 8th page, call attention to the fine line of goods they have specially displayed for the Holidays. This fine establishment always meets the expectations of its patrons.

F. O. HINES & CO.,

the druggists, at the south end of Bridge street, occupy the top of our first page. Frank is a "hustler" in advertising, and hence his growing trade. But for holiday goods, Hines' place is a genuine emporium.

PERRY WEED

has a large advertisement on our fifth page. Weed's cosy and neat stationery and book store is "blooming" full of holiday attractions, especially in the book and bible line, and what present is more acceptable than a nice book or beautifully bound bible?

COCHRAN & CO

at the Opera Block drug store, have a large stock from which to select presents, including the choicest confectionery. A visit to Cochran's drug store cannot fail to result in a purchase, as their goods are late selections, and in great variety.

Mr. Boss fell from a step-ladder while adjusting a curtain in the church, the night of his lecture, and severely sprained his left wrist.

W. B. Flowers and F. E. Boss of Petoskey gave a lecture in the church last Wednesday evening, illustrated with a stereopticon, that was very fine, so was the audience.

Mr. Davoll is purchasing the manufactured product of seven shingle mills. And together with what he manufactures himself he handles more shingles than any man in the country.

Billy Sloan started with a commercial traveller one day the past week, intending to take him to Petoskey by the way of East Jordan and Charlevoix. The drummer got too heavy for him somewhere near Charlevoix and Billy dumped him and his trunks by the way side and came home with the pole and box.

There is a certain class of people in every community who find fault with the price of subscription asked by the local papers, and think they should be furnished at the price of a metropolitan paper. In speaking of this the Flint Globe says truly: "The fact is that there is no metropolitan paper that possesses half the actual value to the resident of a given locality that the local paper does, and at four times the actual price the local paper would be the cheaper. The home paper is the constant and vigilant promoter of the business interests of the local community, and of every business and working man in it. The home paper fights for home interests and is the disinterested champion of every citizen who makes his living by honest work or honest production or exchange of commodities. The farmer perhaps most of all, but the merchant, the manufacturer and the laborer, each in his turn, and his turn comes every issue of the paper, gets the benefit of the good words the local paper is saying for him."

ANNUAL SUMMARY

Of the Lake Exports of Charlevoix Co. for the Past Three Years.

Following is a tabulated statement of the exports of Charlevoix county, as shown by the Custom House records, for the seasons of '85, '86 and '87:

ARTICLES.	1885.	1886.	1887
Hardwood Lumber ft	11,128,000	15,315,000	11,808,314
Pine Lumber, ft.	143,000	......
Hemlock Lumber, ft	230,000	735,000	927,730
Cedar Shingles	2,750,000	2,450,000	1,850,000
Wood, cords	18,780	18,426	5,426
Hemlock bark, cords	10,547	6,851	3,881
Cedar Posts	54,500	55,380	65,200
Basswood lumber, cu ft	91,200	......
Potatoes, bu	39,856	8,057	......
Ties	64,000	196,213	114,650
Broom Handles	15,000	......	......
Pickets & Chair stock	......	81,000	......
Empty Casks	600	75	......
Butter, lbs	200	......	......
Staves	......	10,200
Slabs, cords	160	500	646
Scrap Iron, tons	2	2	......
Hoops	......	4,267,000	......
Pig Iron, tons	2,364	3,661	8,675
Heading	18,000	1,610	......
Turnips, bu	28,000	......	......

It will be seen that our principal product — hardwood lumber — this season receded to figures but a trifle in excess of those of 1884; 3,506,686 feet less than last year.

Hemlock lumber shipments were increased over last year by 192,730 feet.

The export of cedar shingles was 4,400,000 in excess of last year.

The shipment of hemlock bark has largely fallen off.

The shipment of wood has fallen off from last year's figures by nearly 13,000 cords, while about 10,000 more posts, and 81,563 less ties, were put afloat this year than last.

Pig iron exports exceed those of last year by nearly 4,000 tons.

The shipment of fish, of which no record is obtainable, is undoubtedly much larger than last year.

We are unable to give figures in the item of hoops, as but two cargoes have been shipped by vessel — the bulk of the product having been transferred to rail within the collection district; hence no record.

The decrease in the shipment of certain commodities is really a blessing in disguise. It indicates a probability of more grain next fall, and improvement in the condition of our farming population.

General and Political.

The fiftieth Congress convened on Monday. Carlisle was re-elected Speaker of the House.

The German Crown Prince is comfortable, but his physicians say he cannot live over two years.

M. Sadi-Carnot was elected President of France on the 3d. Everything passed off comparatively quiet—for France.

There is no doubt but that Congress will this winter pass a stringent law against the gatherings and utterances of anarchists, and providing for banishment.

While the third party prohibition leaders are still working on the old lines of "anything to beat the republican party," the republican party continues to work for the accomplishment of practical temperance reform and the general good of society. The third party will continue to talk. The republican party will continue to act.

The first loan made by DeLesseps for the Panama ditch aggregated $154,500,000. Of this immense sum, large enough to buy two or three South American republics, only $28,000,000 was expended in the real work of digging the canal. The rest went for junketing tours and other "preliminary" work. Monsieur's grandsons will probably be grayheaded before this expensive mill-race is completed.

Mr. St. John, the $50 a night philanthropist, in his speech at Chicago on Thursday charged that the saloon ruled both of the great political parties. His charge was undoubtedly true so far as the democratic party is concerned and false with reference to the republican party. He might, however, have truthfully said that the saloons' liberal contributions to the democratic national committee's treasury in 1884 enabled it to help defray the expenses of the St. John presidential campaign.

In every State where the third party prohibitionists have held the balance of power they have so used it as to permit the saloon power to gain the victory. This is something that temperance people everywhere should bear in mind. The same is true in counties and congressional districts as well as in States. The action of the third party in New York this fall illustrates the point very clearly. The saloon power there owes its victory there to the third party prohibitionists and is ready to put up big money any day to continue the present arrangement another year.

DROWNED!

Willie Miller, Formerly of Charlevoix, Lost at Frankfort.

Yesterday the SENTINEL received a special telegram from Frankfort, stating that Willie, youngest son of Capt. Harrison Miller, of the Point Betsy Life Saving Station, was drowned about 10 a. m.

He had been up the beach after a skiff, and returning, it swamped with him in the surf.

He was known here as "young Tip;" was about fifteen years of age, and, before leaving Charlevoix, was employed in Hines' drug store.

Capt. and Mrs. Miller will have much sympathy here.

Local Option in Antrim and Grand Traverse Counties.

Telegraphic advices from Antrim and Grand Traverse counties, are to the effect that at the special election Monday, local option was carried by majorities not far from 400 in each county.

From Banks.

The SENTINEL seems to think that its Banks correspondent is dead, but it is a mistake.

It would take a smart weather prophet to guess the weather a week ahead, nowadays.

Dan Flanigan has gone to Chicago to buy goods and make contracts for the winter.

Specimens of Miss Jeffries' penmanship are on exhibition at the Atwood stores.

Wm. Ingalls and Rob Rogers have bought a saw-mill, to be driven by their threshing engine, and will do custom sawing for the farmers this winter.

Will Byers is back from the lumber woods. During his stay there he made the acquaintance of an animal peculiar to lumber camps, and concluded he didn't like 'em.

W. L. Stugar has had a successful season's fishing at Antrim, having lifted from five to twenty-five hundred pounds daily for the last four weeks.

Local option has not made much of a stir here, for the simple reason that people who are in earnest about prohibition do not take kindly to any half way measure.

A large amount of wheat is being milled at Elk Rapids that ought to go to Charlevoix.

Dan Flanagin has added one of Perkins' Michigan Favorite shingle machines to his mill at Kewadin, and will cut shingles during the winter. Several of the boys from Atwood have gone there to work.

Now, John, stay where you are put.

—The Washburn & Ackert heating furnace is working itself to the front on its merits. Last week they put one into the Congregational church, and this week they are to put one into the town hall for heating the high school room. Mr. Washburn, after successfully experimenting on other people's premises, is putting one in his own house. No use sending out for a furnace when you can get a good one at home.

—The Sanilac county Board of Supervisors at their recent session, after a full discussion of the subject, came to the conclusion that the new mortgage tax law is a delusion and a snare, that it would rebound to the interest of their county, if enforced, and therefore they concluded to pay no attention to it. They passed a resolution refusing to buy the books required by the law, and to dispel any doubts on the subject, sent a copy of the resolution to the auditor general. What is the State going to do about it? The board has a chip on its shoulder and is waiting. That is about what is the matter with the Charlevoix county board.

WHY NOT CHARLEVOIX.

Should Not Charlevoix Be the Next County in Michigan to Declare for Local Option?

The people of six counties in Michigan have, under the new law, voted that the saloons must go from among them, and have thereby demonstrated the wisdom of the legislative action which, under Republican ascendancy, has made it possible for communities to throttle the great evil.

Charlevoix is a prohibition county; why should not the question be submitted here?

What has become of the third party in Charlevoix county, which, a little more than a year ago cut such a figure in the county canvas? Where are the philanthropists who, with the motto "principle" inscribed upon their banners, worked for their cause so valiantly, and elected Dan Jerrue High Sheriff of this bailiwick?

Where?

Their silence is more awful than that of the tomb. They have scarcely heard the sound of their own voices since the law-makers put an effective weapon in their hands and bade them strike.

'Tis true, the immaculate reformer and line-worker, David Bradbeer, is not in the field to lead, as Richmond was, but there remains a bright galaxy of his field-marshals, to carry the good work forward. Where is Jimmy Stone, of East Jordan, and our good friend, S. H. Brown, of Eveline? Where is Mr. Parish, of Ironton, and the good ladies who scraped lint and made bandages on the eve of battle?

Where?

'Tis true, there is no Republican ticket to smash, and Dan Jerrue's pocket-book is out west, but the "principle" is here yet, as large as life and twice as natural.

What's the matter with the temperance reformers? Whisky is just as plentiful and just as wicked now as it was last year. Why don't the philanthropists who defeated Capt. Berdan on the temperance issue crawl out of their holes and prove their consistency to the "principle" which moved them to such heroic effort?

The SENTINEL will sign a petition for the submission of the question, and so will many more than a requisite number of the citizens of the county. When submitted, the SENTINEL will energetically support the question, and so will a very large majority of the voters.

If the pure, unadulterated principle of temperance is the ruling motive of the temperance party in Charlevoix county, why in the name of common sense are they wagging their ears and sucking their thumbs when an opportunity exists for them to do as much good for the cause of their espousal now, as they did for that of the Hon. Daniel Jerrue last year?

We believe there are in the ranks of the third party here many honest and well meaning people, who view the question from the lofty standpoint of love to God and humanity. But "there be demagogues and demagogues," who seek only to lead, even though it be only to discomfiture and disaster.

These are the ones who are always ready for political mischief, but shut their eyes and cram their fingers in their ears when the vital question, disrobed of political entanglements, presents itself to them.

Let the good temperance people come up to the mark, and make Charlevoix county the seventh in Michigan to liberate herself from the thraldom of whisky!

Kane, paper on "Ireland during the time of Richard II.," Mrs. Guyles, piano solo; W. P. Brown, a reading from Shakspeare's Richard II.; Rev. W. H. REVERDY JOHNSON.

Recollections of the Famous Leader of the Bar.

[Baltimore American.]

When I began the study of the law Reverdy Johnson was, by common consent, conceded the leadership of the Maryland bar, which at that time boasted many intellectual giants. He was rather below the medium stature, being probably somewhat less than five feet six inches in height, but he carried himself so erect—as, in fact, he continued to do until the day of his death, at an advanced age—that he appeared somewhat taller. He was strong and sturdy in build and seemed destined to live to a very great age, as he undoubtedly would have done had it not been for the accident which so suddenly ended his life. His chest was broad and full, and his voice powerful, which, in using, either before court or jury or on the rostrum, he was in the habit of giving the fullest scope. He would without any apparent reason for great emphasis, and even when arguing grave questions of law before the court in his usual tone of voice, burst forth, after a single instant's pause, in the highest key that his powerful lungs enabled him to reach; and this he did always and constantly, not only before the court, but also before the jury, in the Senate, and on the rostrum. Probably he followed in this respect—perhaps unconsciously—the example and defect in the style of William Pinkney, whom he told me he considered the greatest advocate he had ever known, although he considered Luther Martin a more profound lawyer. His voice was not musical, and he made no pretension to the blandishments and accomplishments of oratory. He had a high and intellectual brow, and his head was well covered with a suit of gray hair, which rapidly turned to white, and which he kept cut very short. His nose was medium size, and rather straight and well shaped; his mouth was somewhat large and very firm, and his teeth strong and irregular. He rarely, if ever, laughed, but frequently smiled a smile which possessed much fascination. He had great dignity of manner, and to those who did not know him appeared haughty and reserved; but no greater mistake was ever made, for he was always kind, considerate, and affable in his intercourse with members of the bar, old and young, as well as with all others with whom he came in contact, either socially or professionally. He was very fond of talking, and possessed conversational powers of a high order abounding in anecdote and reminiscences of the very many eminent and distinguished men with whom he had come in contact, both in Europe and this country. He was always well, even fashionably dressed, and paid much attention to his appearance. His habits were studious—in fact laborious—and he had a vast fund of legal learning. He possessed great knowledge of human nature, discovering almost at a glance the weak points of a witness, and using them with telling effect, both in cross-examinations and before the jury. His examination and cross-examination of witnesses were the ablest I have ever heard, and they were always conceded to him by his colleagues, many of whom would have conceded them to no other lawyer. His arguments before the court were powerful and exhaustive, covering the entire case, and often, when he represented the defendant, and, therefore, was to be followed by an able opponent, suggesting points that had not been made in the opening, but which he thought might be made by his adversary in closing, and he thus had the advantage of answering them in advance and arguing their force away. During the latter part of his life he sometimes sacrificed strength to his fondness for telling anecdotes, or for ventilating his views on some of the questions of the day, thus leaving the subject in hand and traveling largely outside of the record, but never for one moment losing the attention of the court, jury or auditors.

Authoresses as Wives.

No female novelist worthy of the name appeared in England until the reign of George III. The lady who first had the courage to brave public opinion was Frances Burney, the friend of Garrick and Dr. Johnson. Miss Burney remained unmarried until she was nearly 40 years of age. Romance is then supposed to exercise a less dominant power, but she, nevertheless, had the imprudence to espouse M. d'Arblay, a French refugee, whose income consisted only of a precarious annuity of £100. The marriage, however, proved a very happy one. Macaulay describes M. d'Arblay as "an honorable and amiable man, with a handsome person, frank, soldier-like manners, and some taste for letters." The pair did not suffer from poverty; the wife became the bread-winner; and not long after her marriage her third novel, "Camilla," was published, by which she is said to have realized over 3,000 guineas.

Charlotte Bronte, in the zenith of her fame, married Mr. Nicholls, her father's curate, a thoroughly good, conscientious man, but possessing no literary tastes. It was the woman, not the authoress, with whom the hardworking clergyman fell in love, and he would rather have preferred than otherwise that she had not written at all. This fact seemed to add to, not to detract from, his wife's happiness. Writing of him to a friend shortly after her marriage, she thus speaks: "One of the villagers, when proposing my husband's health, described him as a consistent Christian and a kind gentleman. I own the words touched me deeply, and I thought that to merit and win such a character was better than to earn wealth, or fame, or power."

Lady Mary Wortley Montagu was a great benefactress to her country, and a very clever and beautiful woman; but she was not quite fitted for domestic life; though, however, she chose to reside abroad while her husband remained in England, they regularly corresponded with each other on the most friendly terms. Mr. Edward Wortley Montagu was by no means deficient in talent. He was the intimate friend of Addison, and distinguished himself in Parliament as an able and upright politician. He was much older than his wife, and it is very probable that Lady Mary would never have accepted him in spite of his entreaties had it not been to escape from a most distasteful marriage into which her father endeavored to force her. Few young ladies would like to imitate her example and elope with a man with whom they were not in love, but the high-spirited daughter of Lord Kingston would not be given away against her will.

The life of Angelica Kaufmann, the gifted Swiss artist, was a very romantic one. It has been said that she actually refused the hand of Sir Joshua Reynolds. Whether this is true or not, it is almost certain that while in England she married an adventurer who represented himself as Count Horn, a Swedish nobleman. Her second and last husband was an artist of the name of Zucchi, whom she had known from a child, and the remainder of her life was spent happily with him in Italy.—London Exchange.

How to Use an Umbrella.

The proper way to open an umbrella without damaging it is to loosen the folds by means of a quick shaking of the right hand, in which the umbrella should be held by the handle. Then press the fastenings with the thumb of the left hand, and you will find that the umbrella opens without hindrance at any point. Many fine silk umbrellas are damaged and frequently ruined by carelessness on the part of the owner. You frequently see the band that holds the folds in place unfastened by a tug at the end which projects beyond the button. In order to render the band and button more serviceable, the band should be pulled gently as if to tighten it about the handle. This will permit the button to pass through the opening without the necessity of half wrenching it from the band by a fierce tug. Then the umbrella-smasher clutches the handle in one hand, and without loosening the folds; which may be damp, he presses the fastening with his thumb, and is surprised that the umbrella does not yield to the pressure. Then he pushes at the fastening until something gives away. Perhaps the umbrella will open, and perhaps one of the ribs has been weakened and forced through the covering.

In order to fold an umbrella neatly, hold the handle in the right hand in such a way as to keep the ends of the ribs pressed close to the handle between the forefinger and thumb, as you turn the handle dexterously by elevating the wrist, your hand, of course, being palm downward on the handle. But the neatness of the fold depends equally upon the service of the left hand. With the left you grasp the tother end of the umbrella, palm upward, as you turn with the right use the left to gather and hold the folds securely, as you move it along carefully until it strikes the band. Hold the band with the left and fasten it with the right. If the folding has been done properly the band can be placed over the button without tugging at the end of the band with all your might.—Albany Journal.

A Japanese Chemist's Shop.

The quaint old man whose loyal adherence to the customs of his ancestors afforded me such an interesting illustration both of old Japan and old Britain, was a seller of curoyakie, i. e., carbonized animals; in other words, animals reduced to charcoal, and potted in small covered jars of earthenware, to be sold as medicine for the sick and suffering. Formerly all these animals were kept alive in the back premises, and customers selected the creature for themselves, and stood by to see it killed and burned on the spot, so that there could be no deception, and no doubt as to the freshness of their charred medicine. Doubtless some insensible foreign influence may account for the disappearance of the menagerie of waiting victims and their cremation-ground; now the zoological back yard has vanished, and only the strange chemist's shop remains, like a well-stored museum, wherein are ranged portions of the dried carcasses of dogs and deer, foxes and badgers, rats and mice, toads and frogs, tigers and elephants. The rarer the animal, and the farther it has traveled, the more precious, apparently, are its virtues. From the roof hung festoons of gigantic snake-skins, which certainly were foreign importations from some land where pythons flourish, Japan being happily exempt from the presence of such beautiful monsters. I saw one very fine piece of a skin, which, though badly dried and much shrunken, measured twenty-six inches across, but it was only a fragment ten feet in length, and was being gradually consumed, inch by inch, to lend mystic virtue to compounds of many strange ingredients. I was told that the perfect skin must have measured very nearly fifty feet in length. I saw another fragment twenty-two feet long and twelve inches wide; this also had evidently shrunk considerably in drying, and must, when in life, have been a very fine specimen.

Paper Axle Boxes.

Experiments are being made on Prussian railways with axle boxes fitted with bearings of vegetable parchment in place of brass. The parchment is strongly compressed before being used, and it is thoroughly dried, to prevent subsequent shrinkage. Wooden rings are placed on the outside of the bearings, fitting the collars of the journal. An emulsion of water and oil and all the mineral oils are used as lubricants. The parchment soon becomes impregnated with oil, and is able to go a long time without a renewal of lubrication. It is between the body of the journal and the thin edge of the parchment segments that friction takes place. The claim is made that these compressed paper bearings make a tough material that is superior to metal. Such bearings are also in use in a German saw-mill, with satisfactory operation.—American Cultivator.

The New Testament in Calmuck.

The Imperial Academy of Science has recently completed the publication of a translation of the New Testament into the language of the Calmucks. This is the first attempt to make known to the Calmucks the text of the Christian gospels. The initiative is due to the British Bible Society, by which the work of translation was confided to Prof. Pozneieff, of the chair of Mongol and Calmuck literature in the University of St. Petersburg.

Two hundred copies have been sent to Astrachan and sold to the converted Calmucks of that province. The rest have been sent for distribution in Asia by European missionaries.—London Times.

Tree Rings.

The old supposition that each concentric ring marks a year's growth has been proven to be erroneous by observations during recent years. These results were yielded by trees whose ages were positively known at the time of cutting: Pig hickory 11 years old showed 16 rings; green ash, 8 years, 11 rings; burr oak, 10 years 24 rings; chestnut, 4 years, 8 rings; peach, 8 years, 9 rings; chestnut oak, 24 years, 18 rings; Kentucky coffee tree, 10 years, 14 rings.—Arkansaw Traveler.

WHOEVER considers the study of anatomy I believe will never be an atheist; the frame of man's body and coherence of its parts being so strange and paradoxical that I hold it to be the greatest miracle of nature.—Lord Herbert of Cherbury.

WHEN you are nailing down carpets and pound your finger it's time to try a new tack.

Eyes of the Bee.

Any one who will take the trouble to examine with a lens the head of a bee will see on either side the large, rounded compound eye, and on the forehead or vertex three bright little simple eyes. The latter are, as their name implies, comparatively simple in structure, each with a single lens. But the compound eyes have a complex structure. Externally the surface is seen to be divided up into a great number of hexagonal areas, each of which is called a facet, and forms a little lens. Of these the queen bee has on each side nearly five thousand, the worker some six thousand, and the drone upwards of twelve thousand. Beneath each facet is a crystalline cone, a so-called nerve rod, and other structures too complex to be here described, which pass inward toward the brain. It will be seen, then, that the so-called compound eye, with its thousands of crystalline cones, its thousands of "nerve rods" and other elements, is a structure of no little complexity. The question now arises, is it one structure or many? Is it an eye or an aggregate of eyes? To this question the older naturalists answered confidently—an aggregate. And a simple experiment seems to warrant this conclusion. I'll get, quoted in Goldsmith's "Animated Nature," adapted the facets of the eye of a fl— pardon me, fair reader, of a minute aphanipterous insect of the genus Pulex—so as to see objects through it under the microscope. "A soldier who was thus seen appeared like an army of pigmies, for while it multiplied it diminished the object; the arch of a bridge exhibited a spectacle more magnificent than human skill could perform, and the flame of a candle seemed the illumination of thousands of lamps." Although Cheshire, in his books on the bee, adopts this view and supports it by reference to a similar experiment, it numbers to-day but a few supporters. One is tempted to marvel at the ability of the drone to co-ordinate 24,000 separate images into a single distinct object. Picture the confusion of images of one who had sipped too freely of the sweet but delusive dregs of the punch-bowl! Under similar circumstances human folk are reported to see double. Think of the appalling condition of an inebriate drone! Those who believe the facetted eye to be one organ with many parts contend that each facet and its underlying structures give not a complete image of the external object as a whole but the image of a single point of that object. Thus, there is formed, by a juxtaposition of contiguous points, a stippled image or an image in mosaic. Hence this view is known as Miller's mosaic hypothesis. Lowne has experimented with fine glass tubes arranged like the cones and nerve-rods of the bee's eye, and finds that (even when they are not surrounded by pigment, as are the elements in an insect's eye,) all oblique rays are got rid of by numerous reflections and the interference due to the different lengths of the rays. Some modification of the mosaic hypothesis is now generally adopted, and Dr. Hickson has recently worked out with great care the structure of the optic tract which lies between the crystalline cones and the brain.—Murray's Magazine.

Writing a Poem.

The poet Halleck, the author of "Marco Bozzaris," used to keep his poems by him a long time, that he might give them the last and happiest touches. Possessing a tenacious verbal memory, he composed his poems without committing them to writing. He revised them in the same manner, murmuring them to himself as he walked the streets of New York or rambled in the country. Mr. Wm. C. Bryant, in his address on Halleck's life and writings, told this story illustrating the poet's habits of composition:

"I remember that once in crossing Washington Park I saw Halleck before me and quickened my pace to overtake him. As I drew near I heard him croning to himself what seemed to be lines of verse, and as he threw back his hands in walking I perceived that they quivered with the feeling of the passage he was reciting.

"I instantly checked my pace and fell back out of reverence for the mood of inspiration which seemed to be upon him, and fearful lest I should intercept the birth of a poem destined to be the delight of thousands of readers."

There are those who still read Halleck's poems. "Marco Bozzaris" remains a favorite of declaiming schoolboys, because they admire the gracefulness of the diction, and the melody of the words, and the transparent clearness of expression which allows the thought to enter the mind undimmed or undistorted.

These qualities, not so marked in modern poetry as they should be, were not gained by hasty composition, but by patent revision, such as Horace commends.

"It is much harder work," said a learned judge, "to rewrite an old opinion than it is to write a new one; but the old opinion is more likely to be a better one, and the work of revision is a mental benefit to myself."

One Cause of Diphtheria.

"See here! when you speak of the causes of diphtheria, why do you utterly neglect the principal one?"

The speaker is one of the best-known residents of Davenport, and has had his home here more than thirty years, and been "a man of the world" pretty extensively.

The scribe wanted to know what new information he had received as to the origin of the dreadful disease so unexpectedly and in unwonted places. Thought that about every cause had been mentioned.

"There is no new information about it—that is, nothing but what has been known in the East for years, though the intelligence may be new here. The cause I refer to is nothing less than kerosene fumes," was the reply. "Why, it is a wonder that this noxious and universal agent has been overlooked here so long. The New York Board of Health a few years ago decided that to this, more than to any other cause, the prevalence of this disease was to be attributed. The other causes—impure water, milk, etc.—are all doubtless as you state them, but why it is that the spread of diphtheria invariably begins with the short days and long nights? Simply because that is also the season for the turned-down kerosene lamps. Children dislike to go to bed in the dark, and the kind mother, lets the lamp remain in the bedroom, usually turning down the flame so that the light shall not keep the child awake. Many bedrooms are thus semi-lighted all night, and the windows being closed, or raised but slightly, the atmospheric condition is simply deathly. A turned down kerosene lamp is a magazine of deadly gas that the health-iest lungs cannot safely be exposed to."—Davenport Gazette.

Enforcing Strict Discipline.

When Julius Mohl, the professor of Sanscrit in Paris, was obliged to enter the National Guard, he mastered the 287 articles of war. Then he used them constantly to thwart his officers, who were ignorant of their provisions, and thus made himself so obnoxious to them that they turned him out of the Guard—which was precisely what he wished to bring about. The law authorized the officers to call out the members of the National Guards for twenty-four hours' duty, but they used to add to this two hours extra, calling them out two hours before the duty began for drill and parade.

Mohl knew this, and, not liking it, used to present himself two hours after the appointed time. One day he thus presented himself ready to fall in when the parade was over and the Nationals dismissed to their respective posts.

"Why did you not come before?" asked the Colonel, seeing Mohl standing at his ease.

"Because," answered Mohl, "the law only allows you to call me out for twenty-four hours, and as I know you will not send me away before 11 o'clock to-morrow, I have not come before 11 o'clock to-day."

"The National Guard will destroy itself by reasoning!" exclaimed the Colonel, angrily.

"Well, then it will be destroyed by its natural enemy," replied Mohl.

"I will give you double guard duty," said the officer, and he ordered him to stand at the gate of the Tulleries for four hours, instead of two. Mohl himself must tell the final result:

"Well, then I went, and as there were a great many of my friends going to and fro there, I began talking with them, when a little gentleman, with a fine cane, begins a conversation with me.

"'Well, National, it is a fine day. How do you like being on guard?' and after a word or two he says, 'You don't seem to know me.' I say, 'I have not the honor of your acquaintance.'

"Says he, 'I am the Colonel of your regiment.'

"Says I, 'I am the National Guard whom you ordered to double duty this morning, and if you are a Colonel (he was in plain clothes), you ought to know that it is an offense to speak to a sentry on his post, and I therefore arrest you for it, and will trouble you to walk into my sentry box till the corporal comes around to let you out.'

"'Ah,' he says, 'that is a joke.'

"'Is it?' says I. 'I never joke but with the bayonet. Go into the sentry box, or the soldier opposite will put his hand on your collar and put you in.'

"He did not like this at all, as he was one of the fine gentlemen of Paris—the Duc de Grammont, I think—and he did not like to stand like an ape behind me in my sentry box, for all his fine friends to laugh at as they passed.

"What could he do? He had before him a man with a gun in his hand, with the law on his side, for he was in the wrong, and his mortal enemy. He made a great fuss about it, and at last I let him go, telling him he had better not be so strict to other people another time. After that I was never called out to do duty again.—Youth's Companion.

For Removing Ink.

A newly-patented composition for the removal and erasure of writing-inks or writing-fluids from paper, cloth, and all other substances which writing fluids and inks may come in contact with, without injury to the paper or other substance, consists of the following ingredients, viz.: Four quarts of water, four ounces of citric acid, twelve to sixteen ounces of strong solution of borax, and three-quarters of a pound of chloride of lime. In preparing the composition two quarts of water which has been previously boiled and cooled are taken. Four ounces of citric acid are added, and after the acid has been dissolved, six to eight ounces of a strong strained solution of borax are added, and after which the whole may be put in a bottle or suitable receptacle. Two quarts of water which has been previously boiled and cooled are taken, adding thereto three-quarters of a pound of chloride of lime. The whole is well shaken and left to stand from four to six days, after which it is strained, and then from six to eight ounces of strong solution of borax are added, and the whole is placed in a separate bottle. When it is desired to remove ink from paper, cloth, or other absorbent substances, the composition in bottle No. 1 is applied so as to thoroughly saturate the place occupied by the ink, a blotter being used to absorb all waste moisture. The composition in the second bottle is then applied. By the combined use of the two fluids thus described, writing inks or other writing fluids will be immediately dissolved and removed from paper so that the latter may be again written on.

Wasn't Ashamed of Her.

"Now, Lige, don't you be ershamed uv me."

This remark was addressed by a tall, stoop-shouldered girl, dressed in a sort of wrapper made of yellow linen, to a fat, "chunky" young fellow. They constituted a bridal party and were feasting their eyes on the exciting scenes of city life.

"Now, don't you be ershamed uv me."

"Ershamed uv you, honey? W'y, I don't know who in the nation would be ershamed uv you."

Force of Economy.

Burlington Husband—Are you aware, my dear, that you make away with about $30 a year in horse-car fares riding to your sewing society and other meetings?

Social Blunderers.

One variety of the social blunderer is he who blandly inquires after the (late) husband and hopes he is well, as he has not seen him lately; or after the divorced lady, whose presence he looks around him vacantly to espy. He then remarks on her absence and inquires with feverish energy after her health. He it is who asks after the runaway daughter or the scapegrace son, whose name is never mentioned at home, or recalls with a visible effort the name of the person he is addressing and then mangles or mispronounces it. He remarks on a girl's looks to her mother and discovers the fact when he has done so or else puts his foot into it too deeply for extrication or apology.

He like minded also who observes, for example, that her ladyship's dress is cut too low to her indignant lord, whom he mistook on entering for the butler, and then apologized on the ground that such had been his impression. Such folk are not generally popular. They mean no harm, but achieve a good deal. Sufferers are too apt to suppose some malice in their mistakes, of which they are for the most part quite innocent. They constantly repeat overheard remarks to the wrong people. They read fragments of letters aloud and blurt out pieces of information they were bound to keep quiet, or they involve themselves deeply in explanations and apologize to you for things they have inadvertently uttered as to your character or prospects which fill you with dismay. The society they adorn would gladly, if it could, exterminate them; but they invariably presume a welcome and disport themselves with a flattering assurance, only to plunge deeper into the slough of blundering, from which it is often impossible to extricate them.—Sunday Queen.

Belgian Coins.

Some of the small Belgian coins, which are, perhaps, the prettiest of all the modern examples, have vigorous effect given them, not by raising the effigy in the center much above the general surface, but by surrounding it with a sunk space, from which it stands out bold and round, although protected from wear by the rim which carries the inscription. With the English or American coins, in which a profile head or other figure swims about in an ocean of background, such a treatment would be impracticable; but the Belgian designers fit their lion very cleverly into his circular frame, without either crowding or awkward vacancies. A disposition of this sort would be the very one which would occur to a trained decorative artist, to whom the jumbles that now pass muster for coinage designs would be abominations; and a sculptor of the first rank might then be called in with great advantage to complete the modeling.—The Epoch.

ARE THERE WILD HORSES?

A Writer Gives Some Very Interesting Information on the Subject.

At a recent meeting of the Bombay Natural Historical Society a paper was read by J. H. Steed on the subject of "Wild Horses," from which the following is taken:

"Is there such a thing as a wild horse, an aboriginal or truly wild horse, in the world now? The answer is more than doubtful. The mustang of Mexico, the wild horse of the South American pampas, the brumbi of Australia, are all descendants of the domesticated animals introduced from Europe. The first horse was landed in America at Buenos Ayres in 1537. In 1580—that is, in less than fifty years—horses had spread to regions as remote as Patagonia. In Australia the diffusion of horses that have escaped from civilization has been quite as rapid, and in 1875 it was found necessary to shoot as many as 7,000 wild horses in the colony of New South Wales alone. In some parts of Australia the horse pest has received legislative notice. The wild horses tempt domesticated horses to join them, and wild stallions also invade the Australian horse runs and vitiate choice herds in a most annoying manner. They recur to the ancestral manners in a way that is always the same. Each stallion, Mr. Steed tells us, has his following of mares, ranging from a few up to forty or even fifty, and these parties may be separate or banded together into herds of considerable size, even, it is said, 400 strong. The young and the weak males remain with a scanty or even no following. The stallion has to maintain his supremacy by frequent combats, which especially occur at certain seasons of the year. The animals are suspicious in the extreme, swift in flight, but bold in defense with tooth and heel in emergency. They range extensively in search of pasture and water, and when hard pressed by danger and famine the herds break up. It is said that each troop has a leader and implicitly obeys him. He is the first to face danger and give the hint to fly. When pressed the horses form a ring with the mares and foals in the center, and defend themselves vigorously with their heels, or they close in on their opponent in dense masses and trample him to death. It is distinctly proved, then, that there can be no aboriginal or wild horse in either America or Australia, although there are tens of thousands of unowned horses. Tradition points to Central Asia as the aboriginal abode of the horse, and there the original stock of wild horses may still possibly exist. Darwin's statement that no aboriginal or truly wild horse is known to exist must still be held as explaining the exact position of this question; but, says Mr. Steed, we must supplement it by stating that 'it is not certain that truly wild horses do not exist;' and, on the whole, Mr. Steed concludes that the evidence is in favor of the existence of the wild horse in Central Asia, but that we have no evidence as to his pedigree in relation to domestication. The wild horse of the British Islands is now practically the Shetland pony, but he is not the powerful animal described by Cæsar. The domesticated animal everywhere, however, reverts very easily to the savage state, and of the wild horse, so considered, Mr. Steed has much to tell us. His paces are a walk and gallop. The double and the canter are artificial, and it is still a mooted question as to whether the wild horse ever trots."

Grant and Lee at Appomattox.

Gen. Horace Porter, who was an aide of Gen. Grant, contributes to the Century an account of his last campaign. From it we quote as follows: "The contrast between the two commanders was very striking, and could not fail to attract marked attention, as they sat ten feet apart facing each other.

"Gen. Grant, then nearly forty-three years of age, was five feet eight inches in height, with shoulders slightly stooped. His hair and full beard were a nut-brown, without a trace of gray in them. He had on a single breasted blouse, made of dark blue flannel, unbuttoned in front, and showing a waistcoat underneath. He wore an ordinary pair of top-boots, with his trousers inside, and was without spurs. The boots and portions of his clothes were spattered with mud. He had had on a pair of thread gloves, of a dark yellow color, which he had taken off on entering the room. His felt 'sugar loaf' stiff-brimmed hat was thrown on the table beside him. He had no sword, and a pair of shoulder-straps was all there was about him to designate his rank. In fact, aside from these, his uniform was that of a private soldier.

"Lee, on the other hand, was fully six feet in height, and quite erect for one of his age, for he was Grant's senior by sixteen years. His hair and full beard were a silver gray, and quite thick except that the hair had become a little thin in front. He wore a new uniform of Confederate gray, buttoned up to the throat, and at his side he carried a long sword of exceedingly fine workmanship, the hilt studded with jewels. It was said to be the sword which had been presented to him by the State of Virginia. His top-boots were comparatively new, and seemed to have on them some ornamental stitching of red silk. Like his uniform they were singularly clean and but little travel-stained. On the boots were handsome spurs, with large rowels. A felt hat, which in color matched pretty closely that of his uniform, and a pair of long buckskin gauntlets lay beside him on the table. We asked Colonel Marshall afterwards how it was that both he and his chief wore such fine toggery, and looked so much as if they had turned out to go to church, while with us our outward garb scarcely rose to the dignity even of the 'shabby-genteel.' He enlightened us regarding the contrast, by explaining that when their headquarters wagons had been pressed so closely by our cavalry a few days before, and it was found they would have to destroy all their baggage except the clothes they carried on their backs, each one, naturally, selected the newest suit he had, and sought to propitiate the gods of destruction by a sacrifice of his second-best."

Solitude in a Crowded Hotel.

"Would you believe it possible to spend a vacation in solitude in a crowded hotel?" a young New Yorker asked a friend. "Well, it is. I've just done it. First, I happened to say in the smoking room that I had often caught blue-fish by throwing a bare hook in the breakers and pulling it out quickly. This is a regular practice at Nantucket, but on Long Island, where I told it, no one knew of it, and I was viewed with distrust by all the men. Next I got up a children's sailing party and we were becalmed until 2 o'clock the next morning. When we reached the wharf half the ladies at the hotel were down there, the mothers frightfully angry, and some of them on the verge of hysterics. Not one of the ladies would ever look at me after that. Finally, as I stood on the stoop one day, a stranger asked me if there were any mosquitoes there. 'Millions,' said I. 'Some of the larger ones the sportsmen shoot, and think they are snipe.' It was the truth, only put a trifle more picturesquely than was necessary, perhaps. It turned out that that man had an idea of purchasing the hotel. After that the proprietor and clerks would not speak to me, and I finished the week with all the loneliness of a man on a raft in mid-ocean."—Harper's Bazar.

Avoiding Colds.

Wet feet are to be scrupulously guarded against. Few people are strong enough to avoid catching cold from such exposure, and when it is remembered that all the blood circulates through the feet every few minutes, it is easy to see how readily chill comes if the extremities are wet and cold. Should they accidentally get so, however, it is best to keep rapidly moving until dry stockings and boots can be reached, when a hot foot-bath and brisk rubbing will usually restore equilibrium.

It is surprising how certainly a cold may be broken up by a timely dose of quinine. When first symptoms make their appearance, when a little languor, slight hoarseness, and ominous tightening of nasal membranes follow exposure to draughts or sudden chill by wet, five grains of this useful alkaloid are sufficient in many cases to end the trouble. But it must be done promptly. If the golden moment passes, nothing suffices to stop the weary sneezing, handkerchief using, red nose, and woe-begone looking periods that certainly follow. A pill in time.

Speaking of colds, I have a theory that no one need ever have one unless he chooses. In other words, that it is quite possible so to train the skin, that wonderful organ that is generally looked upon as the paper wraper to our human bundle, as to render it nonsusceptible to sudden changes of temperature or atmospheric moisture, whence colds come.

And as this is exactly the season to commence such a system of pellar education, as it proved effective in many instances within my own knowledge, and as it is within easy reach of every one to try, I write it here. The theory is that no skin that has been exposed freely for half an hour at the beginning of a day to a temperature lower than it will encounter through the day will note small changes or be affected thereby.

A cold is simply a nervous shock, received by the myriads of minute nerve terminals that bristle over the surface of the human body, transmitted to the centers and so back again to the mucous membrane, the peculiar seat of this special irritation. Let us then so train these sensitive fibers that they will pass by, unnoticed, changes of atmospheric condition, and the matter is accomplished.

It is done by taking a daily air-bath, the entire naked body exposed for a few minutes to whatever temperature and dampness reigns outside the house, by opening every window and keeping in motion about the sleeping chamber directly after rising. If any part remains covered, that part remains sensitive; all must be bare. Beginning with five or even two minutes those warm mornings, the air bath should be gradually lengthened up to twenty or thirty, using gentle exercise all the time, and within two months the early hour will become a delightful one. Even as cold weather comes, there will be no suffering from lowering temperature. Entire freedom from colds is a boon well worth striving for.

This air-bath is by no means intended to replace one with water, but may best precede it, and the protective value is enhanced by a gentle sponging afterward. If this training is successfully carried out one feels warmer of a winter's morning unclad than all the day following with clothing on.

Care must be taken in case of an aged person or one suffering from debilitating disease; but the system has been practiced here with excellent effect in early stages of consumption, where a peculiar susceptibility to cold is common.—Family Physician, in American Magazine.

A Bird Court.

The leaves on the tree were just coming out, and on one of the limbs, all in a row, sat ten or a dozen little English sparrows, while on a little twig just in front and facing them sat another; and while the rest twittered and bobbed their little heads at one another he looked as if he had lost every friend in the world.

The twittering did not stop for an instant, but continued several minutes, when suddenly one of the little birds in the row flew up and over to the twig where sat the forlorn-looking sparrow, and taking him by the top-knot shook him with all his might, then let him go and they all flew away.

I never saw anything like it before, but I know the little English sparrows of which we now have so many are very bright, and I have no doubt that the little fellow who looked so sad and forlorn had done something wrong, had disobeyed some bird law, and this was a bird court and a trial, and the little bird that shook the other so roughly was empowered by the court to administer the sentence it had pronounced on the offender.—Our Dumb Animals.

CURIOUS FACTS.

A YOUNG Mexican girl is soon to appear in the arena as a bull-fighter.

LOCOMOTIVES to the number of 25,-037 in the United States killed 1,426 railroad employes the past year, and wounded 6,548. Nearly one-half these accidents occurred in coupling cars.

THERE is a watch in a Swiss museum only three-sixteenths of an inch in diameter, inserted in the top of a pencil case. Its little dial indicates not only hours, minutes, and seconds, but also days of the month.

THE building of railroads in Mexico has been accompanied by a singular phenomena. Wherever the rails are laid rain follows, and where there are no rails there has been a drought. The fact is said to be well authenticated.

DEATH VALLEY, Nevada, is to be turned into an ostrich ranch. A Mexican has fourteen well-grown chicks that he hatched out there at his little ranch from eggs brought from the neighborhood of Los Angeles. The eggs were buried in the hot sand, and of nights the ground was covered with blankets to retain the heat it absorbed during the day. The ranch is about 220 feet below the level of the sea.

AN astonishing firearm has been introduced in France. It is of French origin, and is wonderful in the results obtained. At 3,000 feet distance 98 per cent. of the balls hit a number of baskets representing a company of soldiers. Col. Lebel, the inventor, stood within ten feet of a target while one of his friends fired at it 6,000 feet distant.

A CASE of poisoning by nutmeg is recorded in the British Medical Journal, in which one nutmeg had been eaten by a patient as a cure for diarrhœa. It caused him to become giddy, stupid, and very drowsy all next day. The narcotic properties of these seeds, and of others of the same natural order, do not appear to be generally known, and seem worthy of investigation.

TWO INTERESTING physical experiments are amusing French scientific men. In the first a lighted candle is placed behind a bottle and the latter is blown upon with the breath from a distance of about a foot. The meeting of the air currents set in motion around the bottle quickly extinguishes the flame, though extinction would be impossible if a flat board or sheet of cardboard should be substituted for the bottle. For the second experiment two bottles are placed on a table, with a space of half an inch between them. The candle is set behind this space, and from the same distance as before, on the opposite side, the breath is blown smartly against the flame. Not only will the latter continue burning, but it will incline slightly toward the operator as if through the effort of suction. This phenomenon, analogous to the first, is due to the fact that a portion of the air cannot pass between the bottles, and is forced around them and back toward the experimentor.

Peculiarities of the Hippopotamus.

Beginning with the exterior, the skin is of enormous thickness and toughness. From it are made the terrible whips called "sjamboks" a stroke of which will cut a groove in a deal board. A large sjambok affords the only argument to which a native draft ox will listen, and a smaller instrument, called familiarly a "cowhide" is used in lieu of our riding whips. As the hippopotamus spends so much time in the water the skin is perforated with a number of pores, through which exudes a thick, dark, oily secretion, which, like the fur of the seal, otter, beaver, and other aquatic animals, keeps the creature dry, even when it is submerged. When, in July, 1849, Obaysh, the first hippopotamus ever brought to England, was taken in the Nile as a youngster, its slippery skin enabled it to wiggle out of the arms of its captor, and it was only secured by driving a boathook into its hide, the scar remaining through the rest of its long life. When, in May of the following year, it arrived in London, I went to see it and inadvertently patted it, not knowing of the oily secretion. Consequently a pair of new kid gloves which I was wearing were utterly spoiled. A female was afterward obtained, and in 1871 was born the first hippopotamus ever produced in Europe. As its mother did not know how to manage it the young calf was taken away and fed artificially. Taking it from its mother was a perilous task, and, after a most exciting series of adventures, was achieved by Scott, the man who was afterward so well known as "Jumbo's" keeper. The little creature weighed about one hundred pounds, but it kicked and screamed like an adult, while its round, smooth body was so oily that Scott could scarcely hold it. Now we turn to the head. The eyes, ears, and nostrils are set nearly on the same plane, so that the animal can sink itself entirely below the surface and be able to perceive the approach of foes by hearing, sight, and scent. When it lies motionless and dozing in the water it is naturally a little lighter than a corresponding bulk of water, and so floats with only a little of the back and the ears, eyes, and nostrils above the surface. But it often has to sink to swim for some distance under water. This necessity involves several other peculiarities of structure.—Good Words.

Sir Philip Sidney's Hot Temper.

We hear a great deal of Sir Philip Sidney as the model knight, and such, indeed, he was, however, closely you look into his short, stainless life. The very first quality for which we hold him in honor is his extreme gentleness. But he could thank his own strong mind and will for that, since he had a blazing big temper underneath it. Just listen to what he wrote, in sharp, quaint old English, to his father's secretary, whom he suspected of meddling with his correspondence: "Mr. Molyneux, few words are best. My letters to my father have come to the eyes of some. Neither can I condemn any but you for it. If it be so, you have played the very knave with me; and so will I make you know, if I have good proof of it. But that for so much as is past. For that to come, I assure you, before God, that if ever I know you do so much as read any letter I write to my father, without his commandant, or my consent, I will thrust my dagger into you! And trust to it, for I speak in earnest. In the meantime, farewell." Did you ever hear anything sound angrier and fiercer than that, from a very young gentleman to a middle aged one? Yet Philip Sidney put himself under bit and bridle, and grew to be the sweetest-mannered, the most meek, patient, unselfish heart of his age. He did not destroy his hot temper, which he knew was a splendid thing in itself, but he mastered it, and put it only to fine uses. It was the hand which ached to stab poor Mr. Molyneux which, dying, gave away its longed-for cup of water to a suffering comrade, after the battle of Zutphen, in 1586.—Wide-Awake.

"LET US HAVE PEACE."

No War Justifiable Except War on Erroneous Opinion.

The great Chieftain who lies buried at Riverside no doubt felt the full force of the prayer,

"Let us have peace."

He had learned that "Civil war leaves nothing but tombs."

The greatest military heroes have not been those who shed blood for the love of it.

Wellington said, "Take my word for it, if you had seen but one day of war, you would pray to Almighty God that you might never see such a thing again."

The sentiment that war is a "relic of barbarism," and—as a method of settling international differences—should be shelved with other obsolete relics of darker ages, is a growing one. The idea of arbitration is more befitting modern civilization.

But it is recognized that the sentiment "Let us have peace" must be given a broader meaning if its full benefit is to be realized.

We see the catholicity which the trend of modern thought develops in the efforts for the union of the churches, the striking down of the barriers which have been a hindrance to the advancement of the true faith.

It is noticeable, too, in the tendency, growing yearly more marked, shown by the medical schools toward each other. Time was when a practitioner of one school willingly, if not gladly, noted the death of a patient of a physician of another school. The "brotherhood of man" ideas of the present day took no root in the medical profession of a quarter of a century ago.

Now, physicians of the highest standing admit, and dare publish to the world, their belief in the efficacy of that professional bete noir, the proprietary medicine.

The late Dr. J. G. Holland, an educated physician, some years ago wrote in Scribner's Magazine, of which he was editor: "It is a fact that many of the best proprietary medicines of the day are more successful than many physicians, and most of them were first discovered and used in actual medical practice."

Millions of people all over the globe confirm this statement.

The celebrated Dr. R. A. Gunn, of the Medical College of New York, in his published book, recommends the use of Warner's safe cure in cases of bright's disease, and other kidney disorders, and says he knows the remedy is used by leading physicians. It not only cures kidney disease, but the many other common named diseases which would not prevail were the kidneys sound.

That great public teacher, Dr. Dio Lewis, had the courage to write to the proprietors of Warner's safe cure, after a full investigation of its merits, "If I found myself the victim of a serious kidney trouble, I should use your preparations." The serious nature of kidney disorders is that they are the real cause of nearly all the diseases from which we suffer. If, therefore, the kidneys are kept in health, we shall escape all such diseases.

The world is growing more tolerant, as intelligence increases; Grant but voiced the growing sentiment when he prayed "Let us have peace," and Tennyson builded better than he knew when he wrote:

"Ring out old shapes of foul disease;
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold;
Ring out the thousand years of old,
Ring in the thousand years of peace."

What Taught a Kentuckian to Bid Good-by to Liquor

"Come, Colonel, let's take a drink," said a visitor from Kentucky to a well-known and successful business man of St. Joseph, Mo.

"Thank you, I won't do it," was the reply, and the Kentuckian seemed almost stunned. It was evident that he doubted his own senses or else the statement of his companion, for the latter still has a jolly red nose and the manner of one who takes a nip occasionally, "just for the sociability of the thing." Moreover, he was a Kentuckian before he came to St. Joseph, and when last he had been in the company of his friend mentioned had been a very able-bodied tippler.

"How is this?" almost gasped the Kentuckian.

"Well, I'll tell you," was the reply. "About seven years ago I was on one of my old-time periodical sprees. I had been comfortably full for about a week in a certain little city where I had become quite famous. I wound up one night by purchasing at retail, for myself and associates of that evening, about $100 worth of different kinds of tanglefoot, and retired at 2 a. m. decidedly oblivious. About daylight I awoke, trembling like jelly, and I seemed to have the entire Desert of Sahara down my throat, I was so dry. Hastily pulling on my trousers and boots and a dilapidated office coat, I started out collarless, unkempt and with an old slouch hat on, to a saloon across the way where I had paid out, the night before, a large part of the money expended in liquor. The barkeeper of the evening was gone and in his place were two big toughs I had never seen before. I asked for a drink and said that I would pay after breakfast. One of them desired to know who I was, and when I told him my name he said I was a liar, and the two laughed me to scorn. I said: 'That's all right, gentlemen. I am as weak as a child and unarmed, and you may console yourself with the fact that you are the first who ever called me a liar and got away with it!' Both of them started around the counter after me and I took French leave. Going to another place, where I knew the man, I told him my story, and he set out his bottle and I helped myself. We chatted together for fifteen minutes, and at the end of that time I had swallowed three drinks and Richard was himself again. I then went straight to my room, took out a big revolver, and began to fill the chamber with cartridges. My roommate, who was a powerful man, just about as big again as I am, was awake and watching me curiously. He quietly arose and nonchalantly locked the door and then asked me what I was going to do with the gun. I told him that I was going across the street and empty it into a fellow over there who had called me a liar for saying I was Mr. ——. My room-mate said that was right. That was what I ought to do, and he would go with me, etc., and while talking thus, and watching his opportunity, he suddenly seized the revolver and easily took possession of it. Placing it in his pocket he went to his trunk, took out a bottle of whisky and gave me a pull at it, and in five minutes I was in bed and asleep. He then went for a doctor, and I was kept in that room under treatment for four days. When I got well I went back to my desk and have never tasted liquor since and never shall. When a man drinks liquor until he is liable to be abused for presuming to be himself, and gets so low that a barkeeper won't believe that such a low-looking bum is the distinguished gentleman who answers to his name, then is the time to quit, and I've quit, you hear me. Gimme a cigar, Mr. Barkeeper."

Use and Abuse of the Tooth-pick.

The tooth-pick, when used with discretion and at proper times and in proper places, is an unobjectionable little instrument. Its occasional employment is, as a rule, necessary to cleanliness and the preservation of the teeth. So also is the use of the tooth-brush. This adjunct to the toilet is, however, never used in public. The person who, after partaking of a meal, should proceed to publicly use his tooth-brush, would speedily find himself banished from decent society. Yet such action would be less objectionable to witness than the service to which some people, who pretend to refinement and culture, put the tooth-pick. There is but one place in which it may be rightly used—the dressing-room, and no person who has the slightest consideration for the feelings of others will handle it anywhere else.

It would seem to be almost unnecessary to make such statements as those in the foregoing paragraph. No one possessing any delicacy of feeling or squeamishness of digestion will dream of controverting them. And yet the tooth-pick is daily increasing, and has already reached proportions that strike the foreign visitor with astonishment and disgust, and make the lives of many of our citizens anything but agreeable.

The practice has doubtless grown, owing to the large number of people who live or have lived in hotels and boarding houses, where tooth-picks were furnished with the idea that guests would take them to their rooms; and in some of the hotels guests can even now only procure tooth-picks at the doors by which they leave the dining-rooms. In other hotels and in many boarding houses, and also, it is sad to have to write, in some private houses, the tooth-pick holder is a regular ornament (?) of the meal table, and its contents are assiduously worked.

In no other country that the writer has ever visited have tooth-picks been publicly used in private houses or in the presence of women. An English woman or a French woman of the better class not only never dreams of using a tooth-pick before people, but she considers it something that it is more pleasant not even to mention. Here, however, it is no uncommon occurrence to hear a lady ask for the tooth-picks, and select one that she thinks will fit her needs.—Epoch.

The Population of the World.

The present population of the earth is fifteen hundred millions, and it is increasing to-day at the rate of 12,000,-000 a year. Forty years ago the estimate of the number of the world's inhabitants was one thousand millions. Better modes of life and the facilities with which food products are transported everywhere have not only much increased the average duration of human life, but so lessened the death rate in the better care of children, that population is steadily increasing. It is now generally believed that the population of the Chinese empire has been overestimated. Conceding the overestimate to have been 50,000,000, we have the following for the several continents:

Population of Europe	350,000,000
Population of Asia	800,000,000
Population of Africa	200,000,000
Population of North America	78,000,000
Population of South America	32,000,000
Population of Oceanica	40,000,000
Total	1,500,000,000

The population of North America by countries may be put as follows:

The United States	60,000,001
Mexico	12,000,000
Dominion of Canada	4,000,000
Central America	2,000,000
Total	78,000,000

Berghaus, in his Physical Atlas, gives the following as the proportions of the earth's population which may be fairly grouped under the great religions:

Buddhists	467,000,000
Christians	470,000,000
Mohammedans	245,000,000
Brahmanists	200,000,000
Heathen	130,000,000
Jews	8,000,000
Total	1,500,000,000

Classed by races the world's population may be distributed as follows:

Caucasian or Aryan race	615,000,000
Mongolian	610,000,000
African	200,000,000
Malayan	60,000,000
Indian	15,000,000
Total	1,500,000,000

It was long believed that the Mongol race much exceeded the Aryan in numbers, but it is now thought that the Aryan race is the most numerous.—Chicago Herald.

A Chronic Tendency Overcome.

Many persons are troubled with a chronic tendency to constipation. They are of bilious temperament. The complaint to which they are subject, though easily remediable by judicious treatment, is, in many cases, aggravated by a resort to drastic purgatives and cholagogues. As the human stomach and bowels are lined with a delicate membrane, and not with vulcanite, they cannot stand prolonged drenching with such medicines without serious injury. Nothing restores and counteracts an habitual tendency to constipation so effectually as Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. Its laxative effect is gentle and progressive. It neither convulses nor weakens the intestines, and its effects are unaccompanied by griping pains. It arouses the liver when the organ is sluggish, promotes digestion, and encourages appetite and sleep. For fever and ague, kidney troubles, nervous complaints, and incipient rheumatism, it is incomparable. Take a wineglass before meals and see how soon you will relish them.

Forgot His Address.

An old farmer named Kent was a well-known character some years ago in Mount Vernon and Vienna. He had many peculiarities and eccentricities which earned for him a variety of nicknames, at which, by the way, he never took any offense. In some way this old fellow had some claim to a pension. He went down to Augusta to be examined by the physician there for that purpose. He was found to have disabilities that warranted his obtaining a pension, but he was very much excited at the length of the examination and the variety of questions put to him. Finally he was asked for his address. "Oh, yes, of course," he replied, "you'll want my address, but bless me what did I do with it?" Finally, after fumbling in all his pockets, he looked up helplessly, and said: "By gracious, I must have left my address at home!"—Lewiston (Me.) Journal.

JUST previous to giving out the hymn, the minister said: "The storm outside is raging so violently that I will ask the sexton to be kind enough to close the doors and windows. It will give us all a greater sense of security. The congregation will now sing, 'I would not live alway, I ask not to stay.'"

His Latin Was Rusty.

Le Rappel tells the following anecdote: At a grand dinner-party a guest as clumsy with his hand as he is witty, drops a piece of pickled tongue upon the lap of his fair neighbor. "Pardon me, madam," he said, "it is not the first lapsus linguæ I have made to-day." The laugh evoked by the clever hit set a stout fellow who was not deeply learned in Latin to thinking. "I can do that as well," he thinks to himself, and deliberately drops a mutton-chop upon the lap of his unlucky neighbor, exclaiming at the same time, "Nothing but a lapsus lingu[illegible]."

Bartholdi's Great Work.

The statue of Liberty enlightening the world, which stands on Bedloe's Island, in the harbor of New York, is one of the most sublime artistic conceptions of modern times. The torch of the goddess lights the nations of the earth to peace, prosperity, and progress, through Liberty. But "liberty" is an empty word to the thousands of poor women enslaved by physical ailments a hundredfold more tyrannical than any Nero. To such sufferers Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription holds forth the promise of a speedy cure. It is a specific in all those derangements, irregularities and weaknesses which make life a burden to so many women. The only medicine sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. See guarantee printed on wrapper enclosing bottle.

The Five Sisters.

There were five fair sisters, and each had an aim—
Flora would fain be a fashionable dame;
Scholarly Susan's selection was books;
Coquettish Cora cared more for good looks;
Anna, ambitious, aspired after wealth;
Sensible Sarah sought first for good health.

So she took Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and grew healthy and blooming. Cora's beauty quickly faded; Susan's eyesight failed from over-study; Flora became nervous and fretful in striving after fashion, and a sickly family kept Anna's husband poor. But sensible Sarah grew daily more healthy, charming, and intelligent, and she married rich.

A Popular Thoroughfare.

The Wisconsin Central Line, although a comparatively new factor in the railroad systems of the Northwest, has acquired an enviable popularity. Through careful attention to details, its service is as near perfection as might be looked for. The train attendants seem to regard their trusts as individual property and as a result the public is served par-excellence. The road now runs solid through fast trains between Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul and Minneapolis with Pullman's best and unequalled dining cars; it also runs through, solid sleepers between Chicago, Ashland, Duluth and the famous mining regions of Northern Wisconsin and Michigan.

Itching Piles.

Symptoms—Moisture; intense itching and stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form, which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. Swayne's Ointment stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It is equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. Ringing Noises

In the ears, sometimes a roaring, buzzing sound, or snapping like the report of a pistol, are caused by catarrh, that exceedingly disagreeable and very common disease. Loss of smell or hearing also result from catarrh. Hood's Sarsaparilla, the great blood purifier, is a peculiarly successful remedy for this disease, which it cures by purifying the blood. If you suffer from catarrh, try Hood's Sarsaparilla, the peculiar medicine.

"I used Hood's Sarsaparilla for catarrh, and received great relief and benefit from it. The catarrh was very disagreeable, especially in the winter, causing constant discharge from my nose, ringing noises in my ears, and pains in the back of my head. The effort to clear my head in the morning by hawking and spitting was painful. Hood's Sarsaparilla gave me relief immediately, while in time I was entirely cured. I am never without the medicine in my house, as I think it is worth its weight in gold." MRS. G. B. GIBB, 1029 Eighth St., N. W., Washington, D. C.

LIFE IN IRELAND.

Mr. Mandeville Turns on His Jailer—Evictions at Wexford—A Picture of Tullamore Prison.

A CABLE dispatch from Dublin says: "A writ has been sworn out by Mr. Mandeville against the governor of Tullamore prison for assault. The charges are based upon the treatment he received at the time his clothes were stripped off by the prison authorities. The eviction of Foley, a tenant on Col. Tottenham's estate at Wexford, was resisted. The house was barricaded and boiling water and stones were thrown at the evicters. The officers secured a fire engine and drenched the tenants, who surrendered. Ten arrests were made."

GLOOMY TULLAMORE.

The prison buildings at Tullamore, in which Editor O'Brien and Mr. Mandeville are incarcerated, have a very imposing exterior. Over the entrance is a large tablet bearing an inscription recording the fact that the foundation stone of the building was laid in the fourth year of the reign of his gracious majesty King George IV. by Baron Tullamore, the lord of the soil. In the prison there is accommodation for 230 prisoners. A small portion of the jail is used for female prisoners, of whom there are rarely more than a dozen incarcerated at one time. The jail was not used for prisoners under Mr. Forster's act. The principal hard labor carried on in the jail has been pumping water, and, for prisoners not sentenced to hard labor, sack-making.

MR. CARLISLE TALKS.

The Speaker Confident that Congress Will Effect a Reduction of Import Duties.

WITH regard to prospective legislation on the tariff Speaker Carlisle is reported by a Washington correspondent as saying:

"I have every reason to believe that an equitable reduction on imports will be effected during the coming session. I expect we shall develop the same opposition with which we have always had to contend. The Republicans will undoubtedly be found in the position which they have always held. The protectionists will wage as bitter a warfare as ever, but the reform must come. As to the reports which I have seen in the papers that a tariff bill is now in course of preparation I will say that as yet absolutely nothing has been done to formulate a measure.' 'You have seen the stories with regard to your intentions toward Mr. Randall?' 'Yes, I have seen them. I can say nothing whatever on that subject. As I have already indicated, I am not the Speaker of the next House as yet. When I have been elected it will be time enough to talk about these things.'"

NEWARK'S NUMEROUS REDS.

Fears that They May Cause Trouble in the Near Future.

THE police of Newark, N. J., says a telegram from that city, are convinced that serious trouble with the anarchistic element is only a matter of time, and will develop as soon as a labor strike of any magnitude occurs. There is a very large foreign-born population. The Irish are to a man opposed to anarchist doctrines and look upon the anarchists with utter contempt. Among the large German, Bohemian, and Slavonian population, however, the seeds of anarchy have been industriously sown, and the German labor organizations are dangerously infected by anarchist ideas.

Killed Two Indians.

VICTOR M. LOCKE, a big stockman and merchant at Antlers Station, Indian Territory, was startled from his breakfast by the entering into his house of Jack Watts, a Choctaw, and an unknown Indian, with pistols in their hands. Mrs. Locke met the men at the door, and felled one with a stick of stove-wood. Meanwhile Mr. Locke had got his rifle, and, before they could fire, he shot both Indians dead.

Most Cheerful.

NEW YORK telegram: Anarchist Most seemed to be quite cheerful when a reporter called at his cell in the Tombs. "Of course we shall appeal to the higher courts, as in the Sharp case," he said. "My case is somewhat similar to his, and I hope for a reversal of the judgment. It must be so for the sake of free speech."

ment. Most, while on the witness-stand, was asked by the prosecuting officer to state his views.

"We do not fight against any particular Government," said Most. "We do not especially fight the Government of the United States. We are opposed to Government as such; we think that the power held by the Government should be abolished." Most said that the ruling classes were in rebellion, and it was possible that even what the people had the Constitution of the United States would be taken away. His motto was, "Education for organization; organization to put down the rebellion of the capitalistic class." "We do not expect that the capitalistic classes will give up what they have peaceably. There will be fierce fighting on both sides." "Bombs and dynamite?" asked Mr. Nicoll. "Yes, on both sides." "Your idea is to conquer peaceably if you can, by force if you must." "That is history. We believe force will be necessary in time." Mr. Nicoll asked Most as to his belief in a supreme being. Answer—"I do not." Mr. Howe, his counsel, tried to mend matters. He said: "Do you believe in a great First Cause?" "I say," said Most, "as Socrates did, we know that we do not know."

T. V. POWDERLY is in New York collecting information to be used by the Knights of Labor in their attempt to induce the Government to establish a telegraph system of its own. He states that he will officially answer all charges of reckless expenditure by the General Executive Board during the last year. His arrangements to visit Europe are complete. He expects to leave next May.

WEST.

AT Wausau, Wis., a building occupied as a residence by Carl Honikel, his wife, and five children was burned, and the father and children perished. Mrs. Honikel received injuries of a serious nature. The building was a wooden structure, double-boarded, filled in with sawdust, and very inflammable. The front was used for sleeping rooms and the back as a kitchen. The fire started in the kitchen, and the family were doubtless asphyxiated before they were reached by the flames. The fire department was very slow in responding to the alarm. Honikel was a hard-working, industrious German. When dragged through the window he had clasped in either arm the inanimate bodies of two babies. The building was fired by an incendiary. Mrs. Honikel, upon recovering consciousness, and on learning the fate of her husband and children, raved like a maniac, and it is feared that if she lives she will be hopelessly insane.

A TERRIBLE tragedy is reported from the Indian Territory, which grew out of the attempt of a deputy marshal named Dalton to arrest a horse thief named Smith. The latter was found in a tent, in which there were also another man named Dixon and his wife. When the officer inquired for Smith the desperado rushed out and fired upon him, and a general fight ensued, which resulted in the killing of Dalton and Smith and Mrs. Dixon. Dalton and Cole were brave men, have killed several desperadoes in the Nation, and were looked upon by the United States Marshal as the best men on his force. This makes fifteen United States Marshals killed in Indian Territory during the last two years.

A BOILER exploded in the hotel known as the Kirby House, in Milwaukee, Wis., and one woman was instantly killed, a number of others fatally injured, and some seriously hurt. In all, fifteen persons were wounded.

AN Indianapolis special says: "Stories of cruel and inhuman treatment of prisoners in the Indiana reformatory for women and girls caused Governor Gray to make an investigation, which was concluded today. He says he found the inmates were afraid to give testimony in the presence of officers of the institution, and it became necessary for him to request the latter to withdraw from the room where the investigation was conducted. The prisoners talked freely after that. All agreed that the cat-o'-nine tails was often used upon their bare backs, and some of them bore deep marks of their punishment. Another mode of chastisement was to thrust the hands of the prisoners through holes in a door and keep them in this position from one to three days with handcuffs. The Governor will at once recommend a reform in the management of the institution."

AFTER the most exciting campaign in the history of Georgia, the Prohibitionists were defeated at Atlanta and in Fulton County by a majority of 1,122. Four years ago the county was carried by the Prohibitionists by 223 majority. Hereafter whisky will flow free as water in the capital city of Georgia. An Atlanta dispatch says:

The principal fight made on prohibition during the campaign was that it did not prohibit, and that intoxicating drinks could be openly purchased in a number of places throughout the city, which paid taxes to the United States Government for the sale of whisky. Thousands of gallons have been sent in each month from cities around Atlanta, from which it was almost as easy to get a jug as it was at bars in the city. The antis claimed that prohibition injured the city, which was receiving $5,000 a year in whisky licenses without increasing in the slightest the amount of whisky sold in the city. The Prohibitionists, on the other hand, claimed that Atlanta never had prohibition; that while it was so voted years ago, the licenses then existing did not expire at some of them until almost a year ago, and that since that time the domestic wine clause in the local option bill allowed many places in the city by which the law could be easily evaded. This was, however, remedied by the last Legislature, which put a license of $1,000 on all wine-rooms, which license will go into effect after Jan. 1.

to-night to adopt measures, as the call says, to conform to the situation. Councilor Vaillant presided at a revolutionary meeting in Salle de Fevrier last evening. Two thousand persons were present. Deputies Camelinat and Basly delivered violent speeches directed against Ferry. They declared it necessary for the people to march to the Hotel de Ville to prevent the King from going to the Tuileries. Resolutions were adopted declaring that the people called upon the popular forces to organize themselves to venture everything against exploiters and traitors. The meeting dispersed with cries of "Vive la commune." There was no disorder.

LORD SALISBURY'S speech before the meeting of the National Union of Conservatives, at Oxford, makes it clear that the Premier feels that he is absolutely dependent upon the support of the Liberal Unionists. He outlined a rather extended platform of reforms which the Government proposed to introduce at the next session of Parliament, and said that he did not intend to propose increased powers of local government in Ireland until there was a marked change there.

THE rumor that a Berlin physician has at last succeeded in isolating the bacillus which is supposed to cause cancer has attracted much attention in Berlin, as it is generally thought that such a discovery might in some way be advantageous to the Crown Prince, says a cable dispatch. The discoverer is a young physician, Dr. Scheurlen, an assistant at the Royal Hospital. Pending further experiment Dr. Scheurlen prefers not to explain his methods and the results of his research. Dr. Scheurlen is positive regarding his discovery, claiming that no loopholes for mistakes have been left; but before publishing his experiments he wishes to submit them to the members of his profession in Berlin for their judgment. Cancer, by the way, has long been supposed to be the result of some micro-organism. Several of the most eminent microscopists have been at work on the same problem which Dr. Scheurlen hopes he has solved.

The Revista Catolica of Bogota, speaking of mission work in Colombia, says that in Caqueta, San Martin, Casanare, La Goajira, Sierra Nevada, Choco, Opon, and Darien there are over two hundred thousand Colombians who live a savage life. Many of these people, men, women, and children, are stolen and sold into a life of slavery of the vilest description. Sometimes combats take place, from which results the slaughter of hundreds, whose bodies are left where they fall. The Revista Catolica also refers to the plunder of Colombian citizens on the Putamayo and Napo by Dolores Remedios and to his infamous slave-dealing transactions, and particularly to his public sale on the lower Amazon of women stolen from Colombia.

A MYSTERIOUS disease is said to be claiming many victims at Posoya, in Chili. The victims are first taken with pains in the stomach, followed by a flow of blood from the mouth, and sometimes from the eyes and ears.

A NEW ORLEANS dispatch says: "The steamship Harlan, just arrived from Central America, reports that November 28 an armed force of Nicaraguan soldiers boarded the American steamship W. S. Moore and schooner Nevada, both wholly owned by American citizens and duly licensed by the Mosquito Government to trade in the ports of that country. The officers and crew abandoned everything to the captors, who, when their authority for the seizure was demanded, presented their muskets. The owners of the vessels are making an appeal to the Government of the United States for redress."

THE tobacco crop this year falls far below the average. The eastern and western leaf crops and all the market stocks of the United States make up 360,000,000 pounds, against 541,000,000 the preceding year, and 575,000,000 two years ago.

DUBUQUE'S BRIDGE DEDICATED.

THE completion of the high bridge over the Mississippi River at Dubuque was celebrated with great enthusiasm in that city. There was a procession and speech-making, and a large number of visitors were present from the surrounding country. A Dubuque dispatch says:

The high-bridge celebration was a success. The morning was bright, and the city decorated for the occasion. The principal thoroughfares fluttered with flags and bunting. At an early hour great crowds began to pour in. All railroads ending to Dubuque brought their tribute, while thousands of country people from Illinois and Wisconsin entered the city over the new bridge. By 10 o'clock the city was filled with strangers. Great interest centered in the parade, and long before the appointed hour the streets along the line of march were thronged with eager spectators. The parade was the largest and most interesting of its character ever seen in Iowa. It was over three miles long, and the trades display embraced every branch of manufacture and commerce in the city.

WAR REMINISCENCES.

Old Soldiers Rehearsing the Stirring Scenes Through Which They Passed.

Anecdotes of the Battle-Field, the Camp-Fire, and the Merry March.

Rebel or Loyalist?

[ADDRESSED BY AN EX-CONFEDERATE SOLDIER TO THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.]

I.

I was a rebel, if you please,
A reckless fighter to the last;
Nor did I fall upon my knees
And beg forgiveness for the past.

A traitor? I a traitor? No!
I was a patriot to the core;
The South was mine, I loved her so,
I gave her all—I could no more.

You scowl at me. And was it wrong
To wear the gray my father wore?
Could I slink back, though young and strong,
From foes before my mother's door?

My mother's kiss was hot with fight;
My father's frenzy filled his son;
Through reeking day and sodden night
My sister's courage urged me on.

And I, a missile steeped in hate,
Hurled forward like a cannon-ball
By the resistless hand of fate,
Rushed wildly, madly through it all.

I stormed the level flames of hell;
O'er bayonet-bars of death I broke;
I was so near when Cleburne fell
I heard the muffled bullet-stroke!

But all in vain. With dull despair
I saw the storm of conflict die;
Low lay the Southern banner fair,
And yonder flag was waving high.

God, what a triumph had the foe!
Lacred, and arch, and trumpet blare;
As mad the earth their songs did go;
Thundering through heaven their shouts did tear.

My mother, gray and bent with years,
Hoarding love's withered aftermath,
Her sweet eyes burnt too dry for tears,
Sat in the dust of Sherman's path.

My father, broken, helpless, poor,
A gloomy, nerveless giant stood,
Too strong to cower and endure,
Too weak to fight for masterhood.

My boyhood's home, a blackened heap
Where lizards crawled and briars grow,
Had felt the fire of vengeance creep,
The crashing round-shot hurtle through.

I had no country; all was lost;
I closed my eyes and longed to die,
While past me stalked the awful ghost
Of mangled, murdered liberty.

The scars upon my body burned;
I felt a heel upon my throat,
A heel that ground, and grinding turned
With each triumphal trumpet note.

"Grind on!" I cried, "nor doubt that I—
If all your necks were one and low
As mine is now—delightedly
Would cut it by a single blow!"

II.

That was dark night; but day is here,
The crowning victory is won;
Hark, how the sixty millions cheer,
With freedom's flag across the sun.

Am I a traitor? Who are you
That dares to breathe that word to me?
You never wore the Union blue,
No wounds affirm your loyalty!

I do detest the sutler's clerk,
Who skulked and dodged till peace had come,
Then found it most congenial work
To beat the politician's drum.

I clasp the hand that made my scars;
I cheer the flag my foemen bore;
I shout for joy to see the stars
All on our common shield once more.

I do not cringe before you now,
Or lay my face upon the ground;
I am a man of men a peer,
And not a cowering, cudgeled hound.

I stand and say that you were right;
I greet you with uncovered head,
Remembering many a thunderous fight,
Where whistling death between us sped.

Remembering those dead boys in gray,
With thoughts too deep and fine for words,
I lift this cup of love to-day,
And drink what only love affords.

Soldiers in blue, a health to you!
Long life and vigor all renewed,
While on your hearts, like honey dew,
Falls our great country's gratitude!

—Maurice Thompson, in American Magazine.

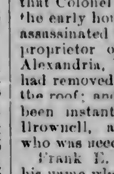
Ellsworth and His Avenger.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.



THE autograph is that of a man whose name was on everybody's lips in the last week of May, 1861, but who, like many another soldier who made his mark early in the war, has been well-nigh forgotten. No loyal American who was within reach of the telegraph on the afternoon of the 24th of that month will, during life and memory, forget what a thrill shocked and electrified the people as the news came that Colonel Elmer Ellsworth had, in the early hours of that morning, been assassinated by Jackson, the desperate proprietor of the Marshall House, at Alexandria, Virginia, after Ellsworth had removed the stars and bars from the roof; and that the assassin had been instantly killed by Francis E. Brownell, a private of the zouaves, who was accompanying his Colonel.

Frank E. Brownell, as he signed his name when I requested his autograph, was afterward commissioned a Lieutenant in the regulars, and I presume is still in the United States army. I met him at a G. A. R. camp-fire about five years ago, and heard him give a deeply interesting account of this young hero, one of the earliest martyrs of the war. Much of what he stated will be new to many readers; and, in order to introduce it, some reference to Colonel Ellsworth, as history tells of him, will be necessary.

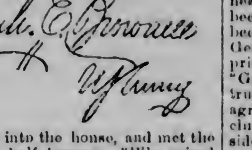
Lieutenant Brownell, when I met him, was a serious, intelligent man, grave in manner and address. He spoke very earnestly of his dead friend and commander as he knew him in the days just preceding the war.

The death of Ellsworth, and the instant killing of his assassin, were so unexpected and surrounded by such dramatic details, that the episode took a powerful hold on the popular imagination. Ellsworth was the personal friend and protege of the President, and his body lay in state at the White House, where it was tearfully looked upon by thousands, who also saw Brownell among the guard of honor. A public funeral followed in Washington, and then the remains were sorrowfully borne to the home of his parents in the State of New York.

The youth, the manly beauty, the active patriotism and astonishing tactical knowledge of Colonel Ellsworth, and perhaps more than all the tragic manner of his taking off, will always give him a niche as one of the popular heroes of the war. Infants were named in honor of him; everywhere to-day you will find young men of less than thirty bearing the given name of "Ellsworth," or "Elmer Ellsworth."

A brief reference to the manner in which he came to his end will be sufficient to introduce the account that Lieutenant Brownell gave of him. He had raised in New York City his splendid Fire Zouave Regiment, drawn entirely from the ranks of the firemen, and had been in Washington with it several weeks. As has been stated, he was a friend and former acquaintance of the President; indeed, he had studied law in his office, and he traveled in his suite from Springfield to Washington in the previous February. After his arrival from New York with his regiment he was more than once at the White House, and looking down the Potomac to Alexandria from its windows, he had seen what the President daily saw—the Confederate flag flying from the roof of the Marshall House. That a glass had to be used to make it out did not much diminish the aggravation. The President was more than annoyed by the exhibition; he was quietly but thoroughly angry. Colonel Ellsworth was one of those who had heard him say that it was a most insolent bearding of the power of the United States to display the flag of rebellion within sight of the residence of the executive and the seat of government.

It was determined to occupy Alexandria with a military force. As soon as Colonel Ellsworth heard of it, he went to General Mansfield and begged that his regiment might be of the detachment. The request was granted. Half the expedition crossed the Long Bridge and marched down; the others went by steamer. At daylight Ellsworth and his zouaves were at the Alexandria wharf. While the regiment was disembarking and forming line, the Colonel dispatched a party to take possession of the telegraph-office, and another to tear up the railroad track toward Richmond. Ellsworth himself accompanied the first-named party. On the way, the flag on the Marshall House caught his eye.



He rushed into the house, and met the proprietor, half-dressed. "Who raised that flag?" the Colonel demanded. "I don't know," said Jackson, "I'm only a boarder here." Followed by two or three of his men, Ellsworth ran upstairs to the roof, and in a very few moments was coming down again, bearing the obnoxious flag. He was within two or three steps of the landing, closely followed by his men, when Jackson stepped out from a room, and standing not more than ten feet from his unsuspecting victim, fired a bullet through his breast. Ellsworth fell, and died almost instantly. Jackson fired another barrel at Brownell, but the charge went over his head. The latter discharged his rifle right into Jackson's face, making a most horrible wound, which would have been fatal, but the soldier quickly followed up the shot with a thrust of his saber-bayonet through the body, which tumbled Jackson half-way down the second stairway. All this, of course, occurred so quickly that the killing was all done before anybody outside knew what had happened. In fact, the dreadful news was kept from the soldiers for some time, for fear that they might in their rage wreak summary vengeance upon the town.

Colonel Ellsworth was at the time of his death but twenty-four years old. A most touching letter was received from him by his parents after the telegraph had brought them the sad news of his death. It was written in his tent the night before the expedition left Washington, and spoke in a strange spirit of foreboding of some injury that was likely to happen to him the next day in Alexandria.

I remember well, as thousands will remember, the visit of the Chicago Zouaves to the principal cities of the East in the summer of 1859. An extraordinary furor was everywhere created by their appearance, their marching, their evolutions. The press was loud in their praise. It was simply a matter of astonishment that there could be in the United States so thoroughly drilled a body of citizen soldiers as this. They had an ovation all through the East. I saw them at Niagara Falls, with two or three thousand others; and I wondered, as all did, at their military excellence.

We can get the keynote of the astonishing exhibition made by this company during that season by considering the words of Lieutenant Brownell about Colonel Ellsworth, as I heard them from his lips at the camp-fire.

Elmer Ellsworth was a poor boy, like tens of thousands of other young Americans, with his own way to make in the world. He thought that he had a bent for the law, and he studied in several offices, among them that of Abraham Lincoln, who was attracted to him from the first by the manly qualities that he saw in him.

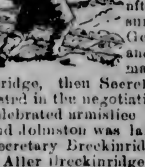
I heard Lieutenant Brownell read the original diary of Ellsworth in his possession, describing the hard struggles of the two or three years before the war. If I could furnish that diary to the readers of the CHICAGO LEDGER who have read about the man, they would marvel at it. Often, by his own account, he had nothing after a whole day's study to refresh himself with but crackers and water. But he held steadily to his studies, ever hopeful that there was a high destiny before him.

In the years from 1853 to 1860 a revelation seemed to come to him from the fields of the Crimean war and the Austro-Prussian war. He fell in love with the zouave drill and uniform. He perfected himself in that drill, even sending to France for the necessary books of instruction. He literally filled himself with the subject, and he made the Chicago Zouaves what they were.

But any one who thinks that Ellsworth performed all this labor merely out of the vanity of commanding the best drilled infantry company in America, does not understand the man. Lieutenant Brownell was a member of that company, and thoroughly knew him in those days. He says that Ellsworth, only twenty-two years old then, was deeply impressed with the conviction that civil war was imminent. He knew that the South were a people fond of arms and military exercise, and that the North had almost forgotten the use of arms. He knew that the war-cloud was about to burst over the land, and he believed that the North ought to be aroused to enthusiasm on the subject of military drill. For that reason he organized his world-renowned Chicago Zouaves; for that reason did he visit with them the Northern cities in 1859.

His example and that of his company bore good fruit two years later. All honor to the memory of Elmer Ellsworth! Why should he not have a statue?

The Ludicrous and the Heroic.



AN incident that combines the ludicrous with the heroic is related as having taken place at Charlotte the next day after the treaty of surrender between General Johnston, and General Sherman. General Breckinridge, then Secretary of War, assisted in the negotiations. In fact, the celebrated armistice between Sherman and Johnston was largely the work of Secretary Breckinridge.

After Breckinridge returned to Charlotte he held a council with some of the officers, and then rode out to camp and made a speech, in which the terms of the surrender was explained by him. He was given a cordial welcome and closed his remarks in his characteristic manner, felicitously alluding to the close of the struggle for Southern independence, though it was plain his feelings were of a contrary nature. After his speech a soldier who had not heard the General's remarks, but had been informed that a surrender had been agreed upon, rode up, saluted General Breckinridge, and begged the privilege of asking him a few questions. "General Breckinridge," said he, "is it true that arrangements have been agreed upon for a surrender which includes all Confederate troops on this side of the Mississippi?"

"It is true," said General Breckinridge, "and the terms are such as should be accepted."

"Well, General, I shall not accept or be bound by them," said the plucky Southerner. Drawing himself up to his full height, the fire flashing from his dark eyes, he repeated: "I shall not accept them: the rest of the army can do as they please, but for me, the sun shines as brightly on the other side of the Rio Grande as here." And waving his hand to the boys, he put spurs to his mule, who also bade defiance to the surrender in a loud saw-file note. The last seen of the unrepentant Confederate he was belaboring his mule with his slouch hat, which, with tail aloft, was making reasonably good time for a mule toward the Rio Grande, where, no doubt, the soldier thought he would land some time that evening.

Green Persimmons.

I wish to make mention of how Major H. H. Dunn, of the Third Tennessee, served "Hovey's Babies." It was when we were following Hood into Alabama, from Rome, Ga., in the fall of 1864. We had marched hard and were short of hardtack. We struck our first persimmons, which were just beginning to ripen. The officers were powerless to keep us in ranks when there were persimmons in sight. I recollect of tackling a persimmon bush, and Major Dunn said:

"Sonny, those that mash on the ground are rotten; eat the hard ones."

Then I went up in front and begged for a bit of hardtack to eat, for I was choking and puckering. Always after that I felt like doing something to Major Dunn.

No Relation.

Billy was a genius; a solemn-faced comique. He could keep a whole company in an uproar of laughter, all the while looking as solemn as a graveyard owl in the depths of despair.

One morning I was standing by him in our tent, watching him make his toilet, which would scarcely pass muster in a fashionable drawing-room.

"Hand me them scabbards, Jimmy," said he.

"Scabbards?" inquired I, looking around.

"Yes; boots, then."

Billy arrayed himself in his "scabbards," a dilapidated pair of fashionable boots, and stood up in a very dignified manner.

"These boots of mine I don't think were any relation to that beef we had for breakfast, Jimmy," said he.

"No," I replied; "if they were as tough as that beef, and vice versa, there would be better satisfaction all around."

J. C. B.

He Never Knew How It Was Done.

SOME of the narrow escapes from death by the soldiers were remarkable. I passed through some close experiences during my three years' service; but the most remarkable happened when we were retreating across the Tennessee River after the battle of Chickamauga.

I had never learned to swim and I naturally supposed if, by any means, I should get dumped into midstream of a deep river, it would surely be the period of my earthly existence. The boats that were conveying the retreating army across the Tennessee were overcrowded, even to the state of a jam, and in the hustle, when we were near midstream, I got knocked loose from my moorings and went overboard. The next thing that I realized was I found myself scrambling up the bank of the river about as badly scared as I ever was in my life; much worse than if I had been facing a cannon's mouth. I could scarcely stand for some time after getting out. But I had "got there" somehow; but how I have never known, as I have never yet learned to swim.

TOBOGGANING.

The Most Healthful and Exciting of All Cold-Weather Amusements.

Some Practical Suggestions as to How to Construct a Slide.

The Game of Racquets, and How It Is Played—Preparing a Racquet-Court.

[SPECIAL CHICAGO CORRESPONDENCE.]

Winter is now fairly upon us, and around the shipping and receiving doors of the big sporting-goods establishments of Chicago are piled great stacks—not of base-ball bats, masks, balls, gloves, and other paraphernalia of the diamond, but of toboggans, bob-sleds, gymnasium apparatus, cases of ice and roller skates, cases of warm and brilliantly hued Canadian wool blankets, for manufacture into toboggan costumes, piles of snowshoes and crates of racquet bats, and all other appliances necessary to in and out door winter sports.

If the weather is favorable throughout the Northwest this winter, the indications are that winter sports will be more generally indulged in this year than ever before. Among outdoor sports, tobogganing and ice skating will of course take the preference.

The manager of the Chicago house of Spalding & Bros., who probably handle the largest number of toboggans and ice skates of any sporting goods house in the country, remarked to an inquirer the other day that where their house alone sold over 8,500 toboggans last year and material for nearly 3,630 costumes, they expected that the demand this year would be almost double these figures. Inquiries are being received daily as to the cost of toboggans and toboggan outfits, and the cost of erecting slides. From present indications it is safe to say that the coming holidays will find one or more slides in operation in every populous town in the Northwest. It is an easy matter for thirty or forty young people to get together, form a club, and contribute $10 or $15 apiece toward the construction of a slide and the purchase of a score of star toboggans. Judging from the manner in which the young people of Chicago have gone into the sport already, they expect to receive their full share of fun for the expense incurred. And why not? An excellent artificial slide can be erected for from $250 to $350, and the lumber can always be converted to other uses after the season closes, or can be stored away for construction when another season begins. Where natural slides exist, this expense of course need not be incurred. Twenty toboggans will cost $100 more, and costumes can be purchased or made at home with such expense as the owner can afford. When this has been done the sport to be enjoyed upon the torch-lighted and ice-sheeted run ways, or by the rays of a full moon when a score or more of rosy-cheeked and brilliantly costumed couples are out for a slide in the crisp, cold air, can only be fully understood when participated in. Of course a regulation toboggan costume is not really necessary to the enjoyment of this pastime of the Canadians, but when a tobogganist of either sex is properly costumed they can enjoy the sport with much more zest and satisfaction. Then, too, it is the brilliant colors of the costumes that add so much to the life and beauty of the scene when a slide is in full blast. Through the courtesy of a large sporting goods house in this city the other day the writer saw some of the most beautiful shades of Canadian toboggan blankets ever shipped into this country for the purpose. The combinations of color were beautiful, and the leaning will this year be more than ever to brilliant, solid, and combination colors. For gentlemen the costume consists usually of a blouse with a frock which covers the hips and buttons tightly down the front, knee breeches, warm woolen stockings and moccasins, the head being covered by a toque of the same brilliant hue as the sash, which is wrapped around the waist, the tasseled end falling over the left hip. For ladies the costume consists of a long cloak buttoning down the front, and confined by a sash like that worn by her escort, moccasins, and a toque. Every article of these costumes is fashioned from the woolen blankets referred to, and is made with as much skill in cut and finish as the art of the tailor can command.

As to the work of putting up a slide, the method of construction is very cheap, simple and strong, but care should be taken that the braces and floor beams and posts are thoroughly well spiked together. By boarding up around the posts of the lower part of the level part of the platform, a large room will be afforded, at a slight additional cost, which may be kept warm, if desired, and afford a means of shelter or a place for refreshments, as well as to afford a place for the club to store their articles under lock and key. In ordinarily favorable localities the cost ought not to exceed $250, which is a liberal estimate. The slide built upon the ice during the carnival in Burlington in the winter of 1885-86 cost the sum of $175, complete. At a cost of $250 a club of fifty members, subscribing $5 each, would do the work. And then, by selling special-privilege badges or tickets to visitors not members of the club at a fixed price on certain days, the ordinary running expenses could be met without further assessment of members. These practical suggestions are given for the benefit of such of our readers who have contemplated entering into the sport this winter.

Another form of winter sport which Chicagoans have taken hold of in earnest this season is that of racquets, and when one has participated in a single game they become, as a rule, enthusiastic admirers of it. A month ago Capt. Anson, the big captain of the Chicago ball club, assumed the management of the only racquet court there was in the city at that time. It stands on Michigan avenue, and is easily accessible by club men, Board of Trade men, and the wealthy young bloods of the city who have become regular frequenters of the court since it opened.

Many readers will ask, "What is racquet?" for the game has never been very extensively played in this country. It is similar to the old game of hand-ball, only that the ball is smaller and harder than a hand-ball, and is struck with a bat something like a tennis racquet, but longer handled. The game is played in an inclosed court, the regulation court being about thirty-five feet long, twenty feet wide, and twenty-two feet high; the walls and floors of solid cement, and the whole lighted by a skylight in the ceiling. The rules of hand-ball apply to the game of racquet, and no exercise that a young man or woman can indulge in is more beneficial in every way. Of course it is not necessary to construct a regulation court to enjoy the game. A spacious loft of any kind, with the walls solidly boarded or plastered and lighted from above, would answer admirably, the only expense necessary being the purchase of the racquets and a box of balls, with, perhaps, a flannel or worsted gymnasium shirt and a pair of rubber-soled exercising shoes. These can be found at any sporting goods house. In Chicago the game is rapidly taking the place of many other athletic pastimes. It is great work to get into Anson's court and throw one's self into a profuse perspiration through the active work necessitated by the character of the play. Then to strip off, stand under a shower, and afterward have a strong-armed attendant rub one down until your muscles feel firm and vigorous, and your skin is red with the chafing gives an exhilarating and healthful effect not allowed by any other means. Racquet is a great sport—at least so say all who have indulged in it.

THE SEASONS—MATERNAL TEACHING.

I.

Come, my dear son, and sit down by me,
I will teach the unfailing signs to thee
By which thou mayest the seasons four
Of the year distinguish. Poets of yore
Have described the way birds build nest's and sing
In the blossom producing season of spring.
They have also written, with elegant swell
Of language, of a [illegible] and glow.
They have ably discussed the lights and shadows
That flit o'er billowing bright-green meadows;
Their pens have pictured unto our minds
How, in autumn, the farmer much pleasure finds
In surveying his fruit-laden orchard trees
And the tasseled corn, swayed by the sighing breeze.
These poets have also hastened to tell
That winter is known by the merry sleigh-bell
Whose chimes ring the snow-clad highway along.
These gentlemen, boy, are entirely wrong.
Give me your attention, you'll plainly see
That far more reliable signs there be.

II.

When carpets on the clothes line swing high,
When the good housewife, with much energy,
Scolds and grumbles the whole day through,
And makes with her scrubbing-brush much ado,
When the streaked snake, leaving his home in the ground,
Makes the village maiden exclaim and bound
As he gracefully wriggles across her path,
When neighbors, whose lots join, discuss with wrath
The scratch power of each other's hens,
When pigs try to climb o'er the tops of their pens
And look longingly at your neat flower-beds,
When frogs protrude from the slough their heads,
When you hear the tack hammer's melodious ring,
You may know, my dear son, 'tis the season of spring.

III.

When ladies, of thunder and lightning afraid,
Crawl diligently under the bed;
When they see the flash in the storm king's eye,
When the patriotic small village boy
On that greatest of great days, the Fourth of July,
Manifests his love for the land of his sire
By setting something or other on fire,
When the melon vine luxuriantly grows
Hidden from view by the cornfield's rows,
And the farmer murmurs with placid smile:
"Ef they diskiver them melons, they'll hunt awhile,"
When these tokens unto your sight appear,
Doubt no longer, my boy, that summer is here.

IV.

The indications of autumn, my dear,
To the careful observer are no less clear
Boys are away with gun and with powder horn
When they ought to be husking their "governor's corn."
The thresh machine holds its blithe jubilee,
And the thrifty housekeeper [illegible]
Makes scores of cakes and pumpkin pies
As the [illegible] she spies.
And at the time-honored county fair,
The beasts of the field and the [illegible] of the air
By woman's deft fingers wrought skillfully
With "zephyr" and "carpetrags" you'll see;
Their proportion of head and extremities
Would cause a naturalist much surprise.

V.

The fourth and last season by this you may know:
The school-boy wades gleefully through drifts of snow,
And changing his wet socks not soon enough,
On a couch of pain swallows some doctor's stuff.
Hens stop laying eggs and the chilblain's dire woe
Makes you wonder what you've done to be punished so.
Jack Frost creeps in through the cellar wall
And toys with glass fruit jars great and small,
And the housekeeper, dropping the silent tear,
Resolves no more fruit to "can" next year.
The "kissing-bee" is abroad o'er the land
And the rustic lover, in accents bland,
Requests his "best girl" to share his lot
As they skip through the polka and "Irish Trot."

VI.

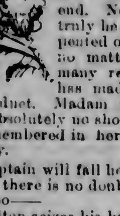
These signs from observation's rich store
I give you, my son, of the seasons four.

A MODERN MAGDALEN.

BY M. C. FARLEY.

CHAPTER XVIII.

MADAM'S WILL.



MR. FREDERIC BOLTON chafes in spirit as the news of Madam's sudden death reaches him. He knows now that all hope of a reconciliation with her is at an end. No matter how truly he may have repented of past follies; no matter about the many resolutions he has made for future good conduct. Madam is dead, and there is absolutely no show now for his being remembered in her will. More is the pity.

The Captain will fall heir to all the property, there is no doubt about that, unless Loo——

Mr. Bolton seizes his hat as the possibility of Loo's chances comes to his mind. He rushes away to the office of Toby, Madam's lawyer, and in defiance of etiquette, or public opinion, or what "they" would say, determines to ask the lawyer how Madam has disposed of her money.

Mr. Toby, however, is not in. He has gone away, and does not return for some days subsequent to the time appointed for Madam's funeral, and, perforce, Mr. Bolton has to curb his curiosity and smother down his anxieties as best he can for the time being.

As a "blood relation" and the father of Miss Loo, Mr. Frederic Bolton appears at the funeral of his late aunt. He is a gentleman in appearance, and Captain Hazard rather warms to the profligate as the two meet in the darkened rooms at Bywater Park.

"But for me he would inherit the property," the Captain thinks, as he looks at his vis-a-vis. "How he must hate me."

But Bolton is entirely too lazy to feel so strong an emotion as that of hatred. So, while he envies his more fortunate rival, and curses his own ill-luck, he feels no other pang, as he congratulates the Captain beforehand on his prospective good fortune.

The funeral over, Mr. Bolton takes his daughter and makes ready for their speedy return to the old rooms in Mrs. McGillicuddy's boarding-house.

But this the Captain objects to so strenuously that Bolton, nothing loath, consents to remain at Bywater Park, until after the reading of Madam's will, any way.

Madam had rested in her stone grave just three weeks when this important event transpired. One morning Mr. Toby notified Madam's bereaved relatives that, agreeably to the wishes of his late client, he would, on a certain day of a certain week, in a month that had been particularly specified by her, make known her last will and testament to her heirs.

Promptly at the time and place mentioned the lawyer appears, with the all-important document in his hands.

Mr. Toby is a roly-poly man, with a frosty mustache and a shining poll. He is a Presbyterian in creed, a lawyer by profession, and a Democrat in politics, and for years has been the chief manager of Madam's business affairs. He now stands in the back parlor at Bywater Park, with the late Madam's three heirs before him, and her last will and testament lying on a table close by.

The Captain glances covertly at Loo as the lawyer takes up the document, and, unrolling it, proceeds to read therefrom.

As Mr. Toby reads he cannot help but feel the amazement that is depicted upon the faces of his auditors as they listen to the provisions of that remarkable document.

Mr. Toby reads to the end of the last page. Not a word is spoken by any of the three as he looks over the top of the sheet, momentarily expecting a burst of indignation from one or all of them together.

Utter silence greets him, as Mr. Toby finishes his reading and looks about him. The will has taken them all by surprise.

Mr. Frederic Bolton's face is expressive of placid satisfaction. There is a look of intense astonishment on that of Captain Hazard, and Loo has turned scarlet, persistently avoiding the Captain's eye.

Still, she is calm enough, to all outward appearance, and, experienced old stager that Captain Hazard is, he can detect in that quiet exterior but little sign of the raging fires that stir her blood as the lawyer finishes the document, and pauses with an expectant look at the two persons most interested in the bequest.

"Suppose you read that last line over."

"I suppose," begins Mr. Toby, "that you consent to the terms of the will."

"Of course they do," cries Mr. Bolton, joyously. "They will be a pair of fools if they refuse."

"Um—er—suppose you read that last clause over again," ventures Hazard. "I don't believe I understand it very well."

Mr. Toby again unrolls the parchment, and, adjusting his glasses, proceeds to read in a monotonous tone:

"And, lastly, I, Evelyn Dundas, being of sound mind, and of my own desire, hereby revoke all former wills made by me and pronounce them null and void. I herewith give and bequeath—on the conditions stated below—to Captain Hazard and my grandniece, Louisa Bolton, daughter of Frederic Bolton, all my bonds, stocks, mortgages, plate, pictures, furniture, the fifty thousand dollars in the Murrayville Bank, and the estate called Bywater Park, to share and share alike, subject to this condition, viz.:

"That, within six months from the date of my death, they marry each other, and reside, as I have done, at Bywater Park.

"However, if from any cause either refuses to comply with this condition, I revoke the bequest; and, instead, the stocks and bonds, the mortgages, plate, pictures, furniture, the fifty thousand dollars in the Murrayville Bank, with the estate called Bywater Park, are bequeathed to the Government, to be applied in payment of the national debt."

Mr. Toby clears his throat, and Hazard takes advantage of the pause and glances at his fair vis a vis.

She looks stony.

The Captain is staggered.

Loo certainly doesn't seem to be an over-ripe plum ready to drop at the first shaking of the tree. She rather looks as if she would enjoy throwing over their chance of inheriting the money and dooming them both to poverty.

The Captain has a beggarly pension and expensive habits, and Loo has the expensive habits without the beggarly pension. Without Madam's money they are poor as church mice, and likely to remain so.

"Well?" says the lawyer, inquiringly.

"Er—er—it seems a good deal like crowding the mourners. Eh, Toby?" responds Hazard, helplessly.

Mr. Toby coughs.

"Of course you can act your own pleasure about complying with the terms of the will."

"Not exactly," says Hazard, shaking his head doubtfully. "I admit that so far as I am concerned nothing would suit me better than to call Miss Loo here my wife. But the young lady——"

Loo shoots the Captain an angry glance. He hesitates—stops.

"If the young lady refuses she will have the pleasure of knowing she has thrown away a fortune," Mr. Toby blandly remarks.

Mr. Toby has no patience with a contumacious woman. Moreover, the fat little lawyer is a Democrat, with an ardent desire to see that public debt melt away entirely during a Democratic administration. He rather hopes his late client's heirs will adopt the high-handed alternative, and let the Government be the beneficiary.

Hazard hesitates for a moment, then he approaches Miss Bolton.

There is something in the Captain's eyes and in his manner that forces a conviction in the lawyer's mind unfavorable to the Government's chances as heir at law to the Dundas bequest.

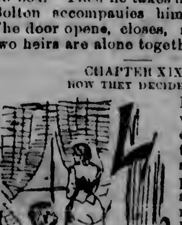
"There is no great hurry about arriving at a decision," says Mr. Toby, shortly. "Any time within six months will be soon enough."

"There's no time like the present," ejaculates Mr. Bolton, his hopes rising, phœnix-like, from the ashes of his late despair. "Let's give 'em a chance to talk the matter over. It is best to strike while the iron is hot, you know."

Mr. Toby puts the parchment in a tin box. Then he takes up his hat, and Bolton accompanies him to the door. The door opens, closes, and Madam's two heirs are alone together.

CHAPTER XIX.

HOW THEY DECIDE IT.



LEFT alone with each other, Loo rises to her feet and marches proudly up and down the room. She is humiliated and angry. She wonders if Madam had suspected all along the feeling Loo has secretly cherished in her heart toward the Captain, and made that will accordingly. The will is doubly abominable, inasmuch as it throws the Captain's future interests entirely in Loo's hands, and forces the Captain into marriage with her, with poverty as the only alternative.

"You see that you are in for it, Miss Loo," begins the Captain, commiseratingly. "My interests are at your mercy, and blessed are the merciful. I hope you will keep that in mind when you decide the case."

"There is nothing left for me to decide," says Loo, shortly. "The matter has been arranged beforehand."

"That is, Madam has taken it for granted that we will agree to her plan, and has anticipated the natural result."

"Madame certainly expected us both to refuse to obey the conditions of the will. She never believed, if you do, that we would allow ourselves to be thrown at each other's heads like blocks of wood, all for a little money," Loo cries, bitterly.

"But I am not being thrown at you," says the Captain, stoutly. "I am anxious for the consummation. I will not refuse to fulfill the conditions of the will, for they are agreeable to me."

"They are not so to me."

Hazard sits down, feeling very much as if a wet blanket had been thrown over him. He has never been quite sure of Miss Loo; still, there have been times when he has taken courage and hoped that all would come right in the course of time. The present attitude doesn't argue very favorably for his hopes. Hazard wonders vaguely to himself what there is about him that is so very objectionable to Loo. Other girls—— But here he bites his lip, and changes the current of his thoughts, for the vision of Littlefield rises up before him.

"You refuse to marry me?"

Will she refuse?

She asks herself the question. Every impulse of her heart prompts her to accept him.

She knows well enough that until she came to Bywater Park the Captain was Madam's declared heir—that the objectionable will is of late origin. If she refuses to be his wife she plunges him into a poverty he never would have known but for her sake. On the other hand, his egotism is so great, that if she should consent, will he not suspect the secret she has guarded so jealously? Rather than that he should know she really loved him irrespective of fortune, Loo had rather lose all.

Shall she refuse? Poverty is their portion if she does. She knows well enough the Captain has no trade or profession, and no prospects save those he has been taught to look for as the heir of Bywater Park. To refuse now is to strip him of all the appanages he has for years considered his very own. To refuse is to doom herself forever to the third-floor back bed-rooms—the sham pianos of the McGillicuddy regime; to endure a greater poverty than she has yet known, and, perhaps, to see her father end his wretched life in the almshouse. These reasons marshal themselves in line before her as the Captain again repeats, in a tone of disappointment:

"Then you refuse to be my wife?"

Loo shuts her teeth; she looks at Hazard, and her resolution is taken.

"No," she says, "I do not."

A red flame leaps into his sallow cheeks. Whether it is caused by a feeling of satisfaction or disappointment is impossible to guess.

"I will marry you," Loo says again, "but you are not to suppose that any other than a mercenary motive actuates me in consenting to a marriage with you. You are not to suppose that I am——"

Then she breaks off suddenly, and a light dawns on the Captain's mind.

"I won't suppose anything, Loo. I know—it's those terrible flirtations—my awful egotism. I stopped all those things when you came to Bywater Park. But I deserve a great deal; don't spare me."

"No," says Loo, hysterically. "I won't."

And then she breaks down completely.

* * * * * *

More than an hour has elapsed since Mr. Bolton and the lawyer left the Madam's heirs alone in the back parlor, to arrive at a conclusion.

Mr. Frederic Bolton has passed away the time in pacing up and down the hall outside the parlor door, momentarily expecting to see either Lou or the Captain emerge from the room to announce their decision.

Mr. Bolton becomes impatient at last. He coughs. Nobody comes. Then he carefully approaches the door itself, and coughs again.

Still nobody comes. Mr. Bolton is consuming with impatience. He wonders if Lou will be so foolish as to throw away an inheritance like that of Bywater Park. If she does she is no true daughter of his. So far as Bolton is concerned personally, he would not hesitate to make a marriage himself, providing the pill was gilded highly enough.

He can wait no longer. His curiosity is burning him up. He taps at the door. Silence. Mr. Bolton feels a natural alarm. Perhaps they are dead. He turns the door knob softly and peers through a crevice as the door swings gently back. He need feel no alarm. The first words that salute the ears of the anxious parent dissipate his fears.

He sees Loo standing by the long window with the Captain's arms about her, and she is quoting, evidently in response to some confession of his follies which the Captain has just made:

"They say, best men are molded out of faults;
And, for the most part, become much more the better
For being a little bad."

Mr. Frederic Bolton whistles softly beneath his breath. He shuts up the door as carefully as he has opened it, and goes away with his mind at rest. He knows now, quite as well as Mr. Toby knows a few hours later on, that Bywater Park will remain in possession of the natural heirs.

THE WELL OF BETHLEHEM.

Discourse by Rev. Dr. Talmage at the Tabernacle.

The Gospel the Fountain of Perpetual Youth—Skeptics Measure Eternity with an Hour Glass and the Throne of God with a Yard Stick.

BROOKLYN, Nov. 27.—This morning at the Tabernacle, after explaining appropriate passages of Scripture, the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., gave out the following hymn, that was sung by the congregation with great heartiness:

Buried in sorrow and in sin
At hell's dark door we lay;
But we arise by grace divine,
To see a glorious day.

The subject of the sermon was: "Thirst in a Cavern;" and the text: "Oh that one would give me drink of the water of the Well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate!"—II. Samuel xxiii. 15.

War, always distressing, is especially ominous in harvest time. When the crops are all ready for the sickle, to have them trodden down by cavalry horses and heavy supply trains gullying the fields is enough to make any man's heart sick. When the last great war broke out in Europe, and France and Germany were coming into horrid collision, I rode across their golden harvests and saw the tents pitched and the trenches dug in the very midst of the ripe fields, the long scythe of battle sharpening to mow down harvests of men in great windrows of the dead. It was at this season of harvest that the army of the Philistines came down upon Bethlehem. Hark to the clamor of their voices, the neighing of their chargers, the blare of their trumpets, and the clash of their shields!

Let David and his men fall back! The Lord's host sometimes loses the day. But David knew where to hide. He had been brought up in that country. Boys are inquisitive, and they know all about the region where they were born and brought up. If you should go back to the old homestead, you could with your own eyes shut, find your way to the meadow, or the orchard, or the hill back of the house, with which you were familiar thirty or forty years ago. So David knew the cave of Adullam. Perhaps, in his boyhood days, he had played "hide and seek" with his comrades all about the old cave; and though others might not have known it, David did. Travelers say there is only one way of getting into the cave, and that is by a very narrow path; but David was stout, and steady headed, and steady nerved; and so, with his three brave staff officers, he goes along that path, finds his way into the cave, sits down, looks around at the roof and the dark passages of the mountain, feels very weary with forced march, and water he must have or die. I do not know but there may have been drops trickling down the side of the cavern or that there may have been some water in the goat-skin slung to his girdle, but that was not what he wanted. He wanted a deep, full, cold drink, such as a man gets only out of an old well with moss-covered bucket. David remembered that very near that cave of Adullam there was such a well as that, a well to which he used to go in boyhood—the well of Bethlehem; and he almost imagines that he can hear the liquid plash of that well, and his parched tongue moves through his hot lips as he says: "Oh, that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate!"

It was no sooner said than done. The three brave staff officers bound to their feet and start. Brave soldiers will take even a hint from their commander. But between them and the well lay the host of the Philistines; and what could three men do with a great army? Yet where there is a will there is a way, and, with their swords slashing this way and that, they make their path to the well. While the Philistines are amazed at the seeming foolhardiness of these three men, and cannot make up their minds exactly what it means, the three men have come to the well. They drop the bucket. They bring up the water. They pour it in the pail, and then start for the cave. "Stop them!" cried the Philistines. "Clip them with swords! Stab them with your spears! Stop those three men!" Too late! They have got around the hill. The hot rocks are splashed with the overflowing water from the vessel as it is carried up the cliffs. The three men go along the dangerous path, and with cheeks flushed with the excitement and all out of breath in their haste they fling their swords, red with the skirmish, to the side of the cave, and cry out to David, "There, captain of the host, is what you wanted, a drink of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate."

A text is no use to me unless I can find Christ in it, and unless I can bring a Gospel out of these words, that will arouse, and comfort, and bless, I shall wish I had never seen them; for your time would be wasted, and against my soul the dark record would be made that this day I stood before a great audience of sinning, suffering and dying men, and told them of no rescue. By the cross of the Son of God, by the throne of the eternal judgment, that shall not be! May the Lord Jesus help me to tell you the truth to-day!

You know that carrier pigeons have sometimes letters tied under their wing, and they fly hundreds of miles—100 miles an hour—carrying a message. So I have thought I would like to have it now. Oh, heavenly Dove! bring under thy wing to-day, to my soul and to the souls of this people, some message of light, and love, and peace!

It is not an unusual thing to see people gather around a well in summertime. The husbandman puts down his cradle at the well curb. The builder puts down his trowel. The traveler puts down his pack. Then one draws the water for all the rest, himself taking the very last. The cup is passed around, and the fires of thirst are put out; the traveler starts on his journey, and the workman takes up his burden.

My friends, we come to-day around the Gospel well. We put forth our pack or burdens and our implements of toil. One man must draw the water for those who have gathered around the well. I will try and draw the water to-day; and if, after I have poured out from this living fountain for your soul, I just taste of it myself, you will not begrudge me a "drink from the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate."

This Gospel well, like the well spoken of in the text, is a well of Bethlehem. David had known hundreds of wells of water, but he wanted to drink from that particular one, and he thought nothing could slake his thirst like that. And unless your soul and mine can get access to the fountain open for sin and uncleanness we must die. That fountain is the well of Bethlehem. It was dug in the night. It was dug by the light of a lantern—the star that hung down over the manger. It was dug not at the gate of Cæsar's palaces, not in the park of a Jerusalem bargainmaker. It was dug in a barn. The camels lifted their weary heads to listen as the work went on. The shepherds, unable to sleep, because the heavens were filled with bands of music, came down to see the opening of the well. The angels of God, at the first gush of the living water, dipped their chalices of joy into it and drank to the health of earth and Heaven, as the cried, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace." Sometimes in our modern barns the water is brought through the pipes of the city to the very nostrils of the horses or cattle; but this well in the Bethlehem barn was not so much for the beasts that perish as for our race; thirst smitten, desert traveled, and simoon struck. Oh, my soul, weary with sin, stoop down and drink today out of that Bethlehem well!

"As the heart panteth after the water brooks, so my soul panteth after thee, O God." You would get a better understanding of this amidst the Adirondacks in summer time. Here comes a swift-footed deer. The hounds are close on the track; it has leaped chasms and scaled cliffs; it is fagged out; its eyes are rolling in death; its tongue is lolling from its foaming mouth. Faster the deer, faster the dogs, until it plunges into Schroon Lake and the hounds can follow it no farther, and it puts down its head and mouth until the nostril is clean submerged in the cool wave, and I understand it: "As the heart panteth for the water brook, so panteth my soul after thee, O God." Oh, bring me water from this well! Little child, who has learned of Jesus in the Sabbath-school, bring me some of that living water. Old man, who fifty years ago didst find the well, bring me some of that water. Stranger in a strange land, who used to hear sung amidst the highlands of Scotland, to the tune of "Bonnie Doon," "The Star, the Star of Bethlehem," bring me some of that water. Whosoever drinketh of that water shall never thirst. "Oh, that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate."

Again, this Gospel well, like the one spoken of in the text, is a captured well. David remembered the time when that good water of Bethlehem was in the possession of his ancestors. His father drank there, his mother drank there. He remembered how the water tasted when he was a boy and came up there from play. We never forget the old well we used to drink out of when we were boys or girls. There was something in it that blessed the lips and refreshed the brow better than anything we have found since. As we think of that dear old well the memories of the past flow into each other like crystalline drops, sun glinted, and all the more as we remember that the hands that used to lay hold the rope and the hearts that beat against the well curb are still now. We never get over these reminiscences. George P. Morris, the great song writer of this country, once said to me that his song, "Woodman, Spare That Tree," was sung in a great concert hall, and the memories of early life were so wrought upon the audience by that song that, after the singing was done, an aged man arose in the audience, overwhelmed with emotion, and said: "Sir, will you please to tell me whether the woodman really spared the tree?" We never forget the tree under which we played. We never forget the fountain at which we drank. Alas for the man who has no early memories!

David thought of that well, that boyhood well, and he wanted to drink of it, but he remembered that the Philistines had captured it. When these three men tried to come up to the well in behalf of David, they saw swords gleaming around about it. And this is true of this Gospel well. The Philistines have at times captured it. When we come to take a full, old-fashioned drink of pardon and comfort, do not their swords of indignation and sarcasm flash? Why, the skeptics tell us that we cannot come to that fountain! They say the water is not fit to drink, anyhow. "If you are really thirsty now, there is the well of philosophy, there is the well of art, there is the well of science." They try to substitute, instead of our boyhood faith, a modern mixture. They say a great many beautiful things about the soul, and they try to feed our immortal hunger on rose leaves, and mix a mint julep of worldly stimulants when nothing will satisfy us but "a drink of water of the well of Bethlehem, which is at the gate." They try to starve us on husks, when the father's banquet is ready, and the best ring is taken from the casket, and the sweetest harp is struck for the music, and the swiftest foot is already lifted for the dance. They patronize Heaven and abolish hell, and try to measure eternity with their hour glass, and the throne of the great God with their yard stick! I abhor it. I tell you the old Gospel well is a captured well. I pray God that there may be somewhere in the elect host three anointed men, with courage enough to go forth in the strength of the omnipresent God, with the glittering swords of truth, to hew the way back again to that old well. I think the tide is turning, and that the old Gospel is to take its place again in the family, and in the university, and in the legislative hall. Men have tried worldly philosophies, and they have found out that they do not give any comfort, and that they drop an Arctic midnight upon the death pillow. They fail when there is a death chill in the house; and when the soul comes to leap into the fathomless ocean of eternity, they give to the man not so much as a broken spar to cling to. Depend upon it, that well will come into our possession again, though it has been captured. If there be not three anointed men in the Lord's host with enough consecration to do the work, then the swords will leap from Jehovah's buckler, and the eternal three will descend—God the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Ghost—conquering for our dying race the way back again to "the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate." "If God be for us, who can be against us?" "If God spared not his own Son, but freely gave Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" "For I am persuaded that neither height, nor depth, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come," shall take from us, into final captivity, the Gospel of my blessed Lord Jesus Christ.

Again, the Gospel well, like the one spoken of in my text, is a well at the gate. The traveler stops the camel to-day, and gets down and dips out of the Valley of the East some very beautiful, clear, bright water, and that is out of the very well that David longed for. Do you know that the well was at the gate, so that nobody could go into Bethlehem without going right past it? And so it is with this Gospel well—it is at the gate. It is, in the first place, at the gate of purification. We cannot wash away our sins unless with that water. I take the responsibility of saying that there is no man, woman, or child in this house to-day that has escaped sinful defilement. Do you say it is outrageous and ungallant for me to make such a charge? Do you say, "I have never stolen, I have never blasphemed, I have never committed unchastity, I have never been guilty of murder?" I reply you have committed a sin worse than blasphemy, worse than unchastity, worse than theft, worse than murder. We have all committed it. We have, by our sin, re-crucified the Lord, and that is deicide. And if there be any who dare to plead "not guilty" to the indictment, then the hosts of Heaven will be impaneled as a jury to render a unanimous verdict against us; guilty one, guilty all. With what a slashing stroke that one passage cuts us away from all our pretensions—"There is none that doeth good; no, not one." "Oh," says some one, "all we want, all the race wants, is development." Now I want to tell you that the race develops, without the Gospel, into a Sodom, a Five Points, a great Salt Lake City. It always develops downward and never upward, except as the grace of God lays hold of it. What, then, is to become of our souls without Christ? Banishment. Disaster. But I bless my Lord Jesus Christ that there is a well at the gate of purification. For great sin, great pardon. For eighty years of transgression, an eternity of forgiveness. For crime deep as hell, an atonement high as Heaven; that where sin abounded, so grace may much more abound; that as sin reigned unto death, even so may grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord. Angel of the covenant, dip thy wing in this living fountain to-day and wave it over this solemn assemblage, that our souls may be washed in "the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate."

Again, the Gospel well is at the gate of Heaven. I have not heard yet one single intelligent account of the future world from anybody who does not believe in the Bible. They throw such a fog about the subject that I do not want to go to the skeptic's heaven, to the transcendentalist's heaven, to the worldly philosopher's heaven. I would not exchange the poorest room in your house for the finest heaven that Huxley, or Stuart Mill, or Darwin ever dreamed of. Their heaven has no Christ in it; and a heaven without Christ, though you could sweep the whole universe into it, would be a hell! Oh, they tell us there are no songs there; there are no coronations in Heaven—that is all imagination. They tell us we will do there about what we do here, only on a larger scale—geometrize with clearer intellect, and with alpenstock go clambering up over the icebergs in an eternal vacation. Rather than that, I turn to my Bible, and I find John's picture of that good land—that heaven which was your lullaby in infancy, that heaven which our children in the Sabbath-school will sing about this afternoon, that heaven which has a "well at the gate."

After you have been on a long journey, and you come in all bedusted and tired to your home, the first thing you want is refreshing ablution; and I am glad to know that after we get through the pilgrimage of this world—the hard, dusty pilgrimage—we will find a well at the gate. In that one wash, away will go our sins and sorrows. I do not care whether cherub or seraph or my own departed friends in that blessed land place to my lips the cup, the touch of that cup will be life, will be heaven. I was reading of how the ancients sought for the fountain of perpetual youth. They thought if they could only find and drink out of that well, the old would become young again, the sick would be cured, and everybody would have eternal juvenescence. Of course, they could not find it. Eureka! I have found it—"the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate."

I think we had better make a bargain with those who leave us, going out of this world from time to time, as to where we will meet them. Travelers parting appoint a place of meeting. They say, "We will meet at Rome, or we will meet at Stockholm, or Vienna, or Jerusalem, or Bethlehem." Now, when we come to stand at the death pillow of those who are leaving us for the far land, do not let us weep as though we would never see them again, but let us, there standing, appoint a place where we will meet. Where shall it be? Shall it be on the banks of the river? No. The banks are too long. Shall it be in the temple? No; no. There is such a host there—ten thousand times ten thousand. Where shall we meet our loved ones? Let us make an appointment to meet at the well by the gate. Oh, Heaven! Sweet Heaven! Dear Heaven! Heaven, where our good friends are! Heaven, where Jesus is! Heaven! Heaven!

But while I stand here there comes a revulsion of feeling when I look into your eyes and know there are souls here dying of thirst, notwithstanding the well at the gate. Between them and the well of Heaven there is a great army of sin; and though Christ is ready to clear a way to that well for them, they will not have his love or intercession.

But I am glad to know that you may come yet. The well is here—the well of Heaven. Come; I do not care how feeble you are. Let me take hold of your arm, and steady you up to the well curb. "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come." I would rather win one soul to Christ this morning than wear the crown of the world's dominion. Do not let any one go away and say I did not invite him. Oh, if you could only just look at my Lord once, if you could just see Him full in the face, ay, if you could only do as that woman did whom I read about at the beginning of the services—just come up behind Him and touch His feet—methinks you would live. In Northern New Jersey, one winter, three little children wandered off from home in a snow storm. Night came on. Father and mother said, "Where are the children?" They could not be found. They started out in haste, and the news ran to the neighbors, and before morning it was said that there were hundreds of men hunting the mountains for those three children, but found them not. After a while a man imagined there was a place that had not been looked at, and he went and saw the three children. He examined their bodies. He found that the older boy had taken off his coat and wrapped it around the younger one, the baby, and then taken off his vest and put it around the other one; and there they all died, he probably the first, for he had no coat or vest. Oh, it was a touching scene when that was brought to light! I was on the ground a little while after, and it brought the whole scene to my mind; and I thought to myself of a more melting scene than that; it is that Jesus, our elder brother, took off the robe of his royalty, and laid aside the last garment of earthly comfort, that he might wrap our poor souls from the blast. Oh, the height, and the depth, and the length, and the breadth of the love of God!

Mary and Harriet.

Shelley and his wife led a wandering life. Now they were living in Wales, now in Devonshire, now in Ireland. Go where they might, however, they had always with them a so-called domestic blessing in the shape of Miss Eliza Westbrook. That young lady was resolved to keep as close as she could to her embryo-baronet brother-in-law. She insisted upon it that dear Harriet and the babies, who were arriving periodically, could not get on without her, and she stuck with affectionate persistency to the side of the pair. It is probable that her presence helped to widen the rapidly growing breach between Shelley and his wife, who every day was growing more and more distasteful to him. The charm her personal attractions had at first had, in some degree, for him, had quickly staled with custom, and he had found how utterly inadequate the shallow soul and uncultivated mind behind the pretty face were to satisfy his ideal of a life's companion. Shelley, however, still for a while treated her with outward respect, and even remarried her in London in order to make more certain of the legitimacy of their children.

But it was impossible that such a loose tie as bound him to Harriet could hold with security a man of Shelley's character and opinions. He met in society Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin, and at once the two were drawn with irresistible attraction toward each other. Shelley had no fixed religious principles to restrain him; his home with Harriet and her officious, meddling sister was thoroughly unsympathetic and cold to him. Mary loved him, and showed it in every look and tone. Then it came to pass that, before many months had gone by, he and Mary were living together on the continent, and Harriet Shelley was left alone with her children.—Argosy.

What a Comma Did for Geography.

Punctuation is an edged tool, for skilled workmen. We all have heard of the lawyer who, compelled to apologize in open court for insulting a professional brother, said: "I called him a scoundrel, it is true; and I am sorry for it." He attended personally to getting his apology printed, and next day it appeared in the papers in this shape: "I called him a scoundrel; it is true, and I am sorry for it."

The following very curious case of far-reaching results from defective punctuation is vouched for by the Royal Geographical Society:

"Manchooria is a paradise on the borders of China. Though a luxurious and luxuriant land, it has, however, for years been considered a country of ice and snow, and all because its great mountain is misspelled 'Cha'ng-pai-shan for Ch'ang-pai-shan.' The latter is its real name, and means 'the long white mountain'—the white pumice-stone being referred to. Cha'ng, however, means 'perpetual,' and misplacing the comma, both Chinese and European geographers concluded that a land with a 'perpetual white mountain' must be cold and sterile. So they brought the top of the mountain above the snow-line, and gave out to the world that this 'Garden of Eden' was another Iceland. Such it has been held for ages."

WE have noticed that the man who has his nose on the grindstone generally gets his wits sharpened.—Ireland Paragrapher.

"A BOOK FOR THE HAMMOCK" is the title of a recent volume. The close of each chapter leaves the reader in suspense.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Notes on the Lesson for December 11—"Parable of the Tares."

[From the Chicago Standard. By Rev. J. M. Foote.]

The lesson may be found in the thirteenth chapter of Matthew, from the twenty-fourth to the forty-third verses. Time, A. D. 28. Place, Sea of Galilee, near Capernaum.

SPECIAL MENTION.

Tares.—The tare abounds all over the East, and is a great nuisance to the farmer. It resembles the American cheat, but the head does not droop like the cheat, nor does it branch out like oats. The grain, also, is smaller, and is arranged along the upper part of the stalk, which stands perfectly erect. It is a strong soporific poison, and must be carefully winnowed, and picked out of the wheat, grain by grain, before grinding, or the flour is not healthy. Of course the farmers are very anxious to exterminate it, but this is nearly impossible. (W. M. Thomson.) The tares and wheat both belong to the special group of wheatlike grasses. Their structure, mode, and conditions of growth are almost the same; and it is only when the fruit is formed that the impostor is detected by its smaller and darker ear. The darnel, or tare, is the only species of grass that is possessed of deleterious properties. If its seeds are mixed with wheat, the bread thus produced causes nausea, giddiness, paralysis, and, in extreme cases, even death. (Macmillan.)

Wheat and Tares Together.—Six reasons why in the kingdom of grace wicked men should be inseparably mingled with godly: (1) Because hypocrites can never be severed but by him that can search the heart; (2) because if men should make the separations weak Christians would be counted no Christians, and those who have a grain of grace under a load of imperfections would be counted reprobates, (3) because God's vessels of honor for all eternity, not as yet appearing, but wallowing in sin, would be made castaways; (4) because God, by the mixture of the wicked with the godly, will try the watchfulness and patience of his servants; (5) because thereby he will bestow many favors on the wicked, to clear his justice and render them the more inexcusable; lastly, because the mixture of the wicked, grieving the godly, will make them the more heartily pray for the day of judgment. (A. Fuller.)

The True and the False.—A Western farmer pointed out to a friend from the East a grove of trees. He asked him what they were. "Chestnuts," was the confident reply. "Come and see," the farmer said. The ground was strewn with acorns. Greatly surprised, the traveler looked up. The leaves, surely, were chestnut leaves, but the boughs hung full of acorns. It was the chestnut-oak of the West. Not the leaf but the fruit decided its species. We often detect the chestnut-oaks. What only begins to appear here is made clear to all beings at the harvest, or the judgment. Then is made a careful and final separation between the true and the false. (Anecdotes on Bible Texts.)

The Field Is the World.—Because the phrase "kingdom of heaven" is used we might suppose that this parable treats of the church, and is designed to teach that none should be excluded from the church. But we are expressly told that the field is the world (v. 38). It is on the earth—but not necessarily in the church—that the wheat and the tares are to be allowed to grow together. If it be asked how it could be said that the kingdom of heaven could be likened to this, we reply that the kingdom of heaven has various elements—a king, subjects, laws, territory, etc. Now this kingdom may be treated of with special reference to its territory, which is the whole earth (Ps. 2: 8), and to its king, how he will deal with those who are rebellious in this territory. There is no reference to church discipline in the parable. True, the principle here laid down, as a principle of common sense, may wisely apply to some cases of church discipline; but it has no such application here.

CRITICISM AND EXPLANATION.

Vs. 24-26. Another parable. The second of the seven parables recorded in this chapter. The kingdom of heaven. The kingdom set up by Christ representing his reign in the world. Set he before. "An image derived from setting food before persons." For kingdom of heaven. See Special Mention. A man. Meaning the Son of man (v. 37). Good seed. Children of the kingdom (v. 38). There may be also a reference to man being originally pure and planted as seed in the earth. His field. This is the whole world (v. 38), which is the property of God and for which the gospel is intended. While men slept. That is, in the night season, under cover of darkness. His enemy. The devil (v. 39), who is constantly opposing and undoing the work of Christ. Tares. See Special Mention. Among the wheat. Meaning "all through the midst of the wheat, making the separation particularly difficult." Went away. So that no one should know what had been done, or who had done it. He simply cast in the seed; he did not need to cultivate it. The blade sprang up. The young shoots both of the wheat and tares, for at the first they both look alike. Brought forth fruit. The grain begins to head out, which discloses the work of the enemy, now for the first time discovered.

LESSONS OF THIS PARABLE.

This parable explains the entire structure of the system of probation under the Christian dispensation, or perhaps through all time. As the former parable describes the planting of the dispensation, so this describes its struggle with evil in the world until the judgment day. It is not so much a parable of the church as of the world and the church under the Messiah; for the field is the world. While probation lasts wickedness is permitted to develop itself. There is to be no organic destruction of wicked men by God or angels; there must be no persecuting them to destruction by the servants of God; they must be allowed to live and work their destiny; nor will they be forcibly changed or irresistibly regenerated in their nature. [Whedon.] The parable of the tares accounts for the existence of evil in this world, and declares that it is not from God; at the same time it assures us of God's perfect goodness, and of His desire and design (short of compulsion) that the whole world should be saved; for, as our Lord declares, "the field is the world." That is, in His will and design, the church is co-extensive with the world. The parable assures us also of the continuance of the church visible unto the end of the future full, and final victory of good over evil, and of the everlasting reward of virtue and the eternal punishment of sin. (C. Wordsworth.)

Our Savior teaches here: 1st, That hypocrites and deceived persons must be expected in the church. 2d, That this is the work of the enemy of man. They are not the work of Christianity, any more than traitors are of patriotism, or counterfeiters are of the proper effect of legislating about money. They belong to the world; and hypocrisy is only one form of sin. The Christian religion never made a hypocrite; nor is there a hypocrite on the face of the earth whose principles and practice it does not condemn. 3d, That all hope of removing them entirely would be in vain. 4th, That an attempt to remove them altogether would injure real Christianity by causing excitements, discord and hard feelings even among Christians. 5th, That he will himself separate them at the proper time. There is no doubt that it is the duty of the church to attempt to keep itself pure, and to cut off gross and manifest offenders. (1 Cor. 5: 4, 5.) He refers to those who may be suspected of hypocrisy, but against whom it cannot be proved; to those who so successfully imitate Christians as to make it difficult or impossible to distinguish them. (Barnes.)

By the parable of the wheat and the tares, he teaches that his kingdom would not be established by uprooting the wicked from the earth; and that good and bad would continue to grow together on the earth; that his kingdom did not depend on force to maintain it; that his disciples must expect to live in the same world with the wicked, and endure all the evils of a warfare growing out of their presence and their poisonous influence. They must not persecute them because they were not Christians, nor seek to forward his kingdom among men by acts of violence. (Eclectic Commentary.)

Do you belong to the tares or the wheat? Are you a good seed sown by the Son of man, or one of those seeds which are scattered broadcast by the evil one? You are either one or the other. If you are not a Christian, perhaps you say that you cannot see much difference between yourself and those who are. That thought is one that has illustration in this parable. There is not much difference between the tares and the wheat outwardly. There is enough difference between those who are children of God and those who are not, however, to cause him to gather all those who are, so that they may be with him where he is eternally. Tare or wheat; worthless or real worth; which? (Hazard.)

Subject of lesson for December 18, "Other Parables." Matt. 13: 31-33, 44-52.

AN elastic mucilage is made as follows: To twenty parts of alcohol add one part of salicylic acid, three parts of soft soap and three parts of glycerine. Shake well, and then add a mucilage made of ninety-three parts of gum-arabic and 180 parts of water. This is said to keep well, and to be thoroughly elastic.

WILLARD A. SMITH, Editor

CHARLEVOIX, DEC. 14, 1887.

Hazings from Hayes.

The tax collector is ready now to gather in the highway orders.

Mathias Manion was buried last Saturday in Pine Lake cemetery.

The citizens of Saunbyville had a jollification last Friday night.

Leroy Hamlin is visiting friends in Hayes.

Harry Baker will move to Charlevoix and assist his uncle in black smithing.

From Banks.

Another fresh invoice of sleighing.

Will and Ralph Kanagy are home from a protracted stay in Illinois and Iowa.

B. C. Hubbell, a brother-in-law of Dan Flanagin is here for a few weeks.

Carl Johnson is smiling on customers from behind the counter at Flanagin's store.

The band surprised some of our citizens who had not heard them play before, by furnishing some good music on election day.

Ingalls & Rogers expect to get their mill ready to run this week. G. T. Bentley and Wm. Coulter will partly stock it with pine.

Miss Jeffries' class in penmanship numbers about twenty-five and the amount of paper they cover with pot hooks and flourishes is amazing.

The Methodist society here talk strongly of building a house of worship during the coming summer. This will give Atwood three churches. Pretty well for a country four corners.

The vote on local option in this town and in the county in fact was a general surprise. There seemed to be very little interest manifested and yet the vote shows a decided gain in prohibition sentiment.

Frank Arno of this place who is said to have eloped with an East Jordan woman recently, leaving his family here in straitened circumstances is reported as have dropped dead in the streets of Grand Rapids.

If there is an open winter prophet anywhere in this part of Michigan who has not sunk down and died under the load of public condemnation during the last two or three years we should like to have him crawl out of his hole and tell us what kind of a winter we are going to have.

General and Political.

The new Postmaster General will have lots of fun pulling the President's free-trade wool over the eyes of the Michigan farmers.

The sooner the Republican party becomes a temperance party, the better for continued party existence and prosperity. We can win with temperance. We can not win with the saloon, because it will be against us anyway.

Denver Tribune: When the next election comes the Mugwumps will feel that they are absolved from all obligations to Cleveland. They will desert him. They will support the Republican ticket and leave the Cleveland ticket to its fate.

General Alger carries one of the levelest heads in Michigan or the country on his shoulders. He was interviewed in Chicago, and said that the Republican party will be stronger in 1888 than it was in 1884; that he told Senator Palmer, after Palmer's prohibition speech, that the Republican party cannot make an alliance with cranks and couldn't satisfy the cranks if it did; that he had then said, and says it now, that the Prohibition party will never see the day when it can accomplish the work it is pursuing; that he believes in the entire abolition of the tax on tobacco, sweeping away the needless offices it supports, as tobacco is the poor man's necessity, and not a luxury; that he is opposed to commercial union, which would put most all its benefits on the side of Canada; and he regards Blaine as the strongest Republican leader to-day. General Alger talks boldly, manfully, and directly to the point, and the Republicans of Michigan speak through him and will back him stanchly.

Ironton Notes.

Mr. and Mrs. Lou Sheldon have been away a few days.

The ferry is still on duty, but every day threatens to be the last.

Charley Noyes is home, when he is not away with the girls.

One of our industrious young men recently bought an invoice of household goods, another a stove, houses have been repaired. What has Christmas in store for us?

If the parents will carefully compare the work recorded on the report cards with the previous month, and learn the cause of any increase or falling off, and compare that with the attendance report, they may see how important it is that the pupil should be in school every day. The past month shows the highest average attendance yet recorded, and the general results of the examinations are correspondingly higher.

Local News.

—Seven new subscribers since our last issue.

—W. P. Brown made a trip to Grand Rapids last week.

—Isaac Mills and wife have returned home from Canada.

—The young ladies' band will give a concert at Norwood to-morrow night.

—D. C. Nettleton has purchased a five acre farm near National City, Cal.

—The firm of Cross & Son, of this place, is dissolved, J. F. Smith succeeding Wm. Cross.

—Alick Rosenthal has a new advertisement in this issue, in which he offers some rare bargains.

—Martin Moses, a brother of Mrs. M. J. Stockman, died at Collingwood, Ohio, last Sunday afternoon.

—Remember that the W. C. T. U. give their oyster supper this (Wednesday) evening. All are invited.

—Capt. Harrison Berdan was retired from the office of Sheriff by prohibition votes, yet he takes his coat off and goes in for local option.

—Rev. W. H. McCartney preached a sermon on the larbor question Sabbath evening to a full house, the Knights of Labor attending in a body.

—Joseph Pappin and wife were called to Grand Haven by telegram Monday, on account of the serious illness of their daughter, Mrs. James Beauvais.

—Thank the Lord the three Charlevoix ministers are all-wool-and-a-yard-wide temperance men, square-toed on the local option question, and not one of them is a third-party crank!

—We had a sort of an idea that the prohibs had gone to bed and blown out the gas, but something seems to have animated them into a sort of reflex action. All right. Now let's chum in and make Charlevoix county dry, for a change.

—Beaver Island correspondence: There has been quite a fishing business done here this fall. A. Booth & Sons' tugs Maxwell and Hahn have done good fishing, while the Anderson did most of the freighting between here and the north shore. They pulled their nets out this week. Capt. Roddy brought a load of coal from Escanaba last week, on the schooner Tom Payne.

In this issue will be found a new advertisement for the Rifenburg Milling Co.'s roller flouring mill. It is a fact the Rifenburg mill is in all respects equal to any flouring mill in the state, in the quality of its machinery and product. The flour has no superior in the market. As a Charlevoix institution, we hope to see all our dealers handle the home product. It pays in more ways than one. Patronize home institutions.

—Now that navigation has closed for the winter months, much speculation is indulged in as to the net earnings of the schooners that get through unhampered by delays or accidents. It is generally admitted that the season proved a profitable one for all classes of vessels. Figures of net earnings are hard to obtain, however, owners preferring to remain silent on that head. There are several vessels running in the Pine Lake trade the past season that have made big money—several of them laying up with $2,000 ahead, and one, the name of which we are not permitted to mention, coming out $3,000 in cold cash ahead.

—Wm. Kanagy of this place, has been granted a pension.

—R. A. Emery made a flying trip to Manistee Friday, returning home yesterday.

—John Bell and Wm. Ferguson have purchased the schooner Mocking Bird of the Bennett estate. Consideration, $1,500.

—Jack Litney and wife of Sutton's Bay, are at Mike's, and will spend the holidays here. Mrs. Litney has been at Chicago since early summer, under surgical treatment, and comes back much improved in health.

—At two o'clock this afternoon at the Aldrich residence in this village, Rev. O. A. Downs will unite in matrimony Mr. Charles H. Ball and Miss Ella Aldrich. Miss Ella was born and raised in Charlevoix, and, while her many friends here will regret her departure, they will throw their old shoes after her, so to speak, as a token of good luck. Mr. and Mrs. Ball will be "at home" in Marquette soon after the holidays. Mr. Ball travels for a Detroit clothing and gents' furnishing house.

—B. W. Miller returned home from Florida yesterday noon. He made the editor's household happy with a liberal supply of luscious oranges fresh-picked from the groves, and set aside for the editor's special palate a very large and fine looking article, which he assured us was of the "Mediteranean Sweet" variety, and from his own grove. We guarded it carefully until after Bill Downer had left the office, and then sat down for a feast. Oh, the thundering skunk! Talk about green persimmons! It's nowhere to a "Mediteranean Sweet." Our only consolation was that the foreman got laid up too. It was one of the sour-bitter kind—fair without but a holy terror within. We have an idea that Carpenter had something to do with the job in Florida.

—The exact purpose of the special meeting of the Board of Supervisors, called for Jan. 5th, is not known, save by those who called it. But it has been intimated by the Journal, in a recent issue, that the most important question to be considered will be that of supplying the county means of perfecting its records. This is the spectre which just now haunts Charlevoix county. There is no denying the fact that such means must be supplied, and supplied at once. Delay only adds to the difficulty, and makes the question of expense a more and more unpleasant one to discuss. But the question must be met. If an abstract set is purchased by the county, the Board should first satisfy itself that it is correct and reliable; otherwise, they are no better than the charred remains of the destroyed county records. But we have confidence that the Board will do what is best for the county in the premises. But the want must be supplied, at any cost within the limits of reason.

—Following are the estimates submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury for appropriations needed in Michigan during the next fiscal year: For the completion of the Detroit Postoffice, $675,364.29; for officers' quarters at Detroit Marine Hospital, $7,000; for the establishment of range lights on Grosselle, $7,000; for removing the crib-work, repairing for signal, and making other improvements at Spectacle light station, $15,000; for establishing a light and fog signal on Simmon's Reef, $60,000; for establishing a light and fog signal on Squaw Island to mark the passage westward of Beaver Island, $25,000; for establishing a light at Elevenfoot Shoal, off Point Peninsula, $60,000; for establishing supply and buoy depot for Ninth Lighthouse District, $50,000; improving harbor at Black Lake, $15,000; at Charlevoix, $80,000; at Cheboygan, $15,000; at Frankfort, $25,000; at Grand Haven, $100,000; at Grand Marais, $100,000; Ludington, $120,000, Manistee, $30,000; Monroe, $5,000; Muskegon, $50,000; Ontonagon, $25,000; Pentwater, $20,000, Portage Lake, $60,000; Sand Beach, $130,000; St. Josephs, $20,000; Saugatuck, $5,000; White River, $25,000.

This Winter's Business.

The outlook for this winter regarding the industries of this region cannot be said to be especially discouraging, notwithstanding the existence of many circumstances that materially tend to stagnate the markets upon which the demand for our products depends.

In the manufacture of one article—railroad ties—there will be a perceptible decline from the figures of previous years, not so much from the primary cause of decreased consumption as the fact that last year's output was largely in excess of demand. The overplus will, for a portion of the winter, check the making of any large contracts.

Smithson's establishment will exceed its product of last year in cedar and lumber, and Willcox will employ about thirty men in Norwood township, just south of Charlevoix.

The Pine Lake Lumber Co. will put in from 8,000,000 to 10,000,000 of hardwood.

Saunby, in Hayes, will run his mill to its full capacity on ties and shingles, while Reuben Bennett, in the same township, will put half a million feet of hardwood logs into Oyster Bay.

Barker will stock Sweet's mill with 1,000,000 feet of hardwood.

Our local dealers will buy ties and posts, paying the highest market price therefor.

We cannot see any especial indications that the present winter will be unusually stringent.

—Miss Jeffries won golden opinions as a teacher of penmanship, from her class here. We have examined specimens of several of her pupils, and can testify that the improvement has been decided.—Banks correspondent.

—W. H. Downer accompanied by C. A. Barker, of Chicago, arrived Wednesday, and Mr. Barker has been looking over the cedar business. Mr. Downer expects to make a trip to Georgian Bay this winter, in Mr. Barker's interest.

—The north show window of George Miller's store is worth walking a mile to see, more especially in the evening. A finer decoration never graced Bridge Street than is presented. It is the work of Mills Kanagy. Of course, the one important feature is having the "stuff" to do it with, and in neckties and silk handkerchiefs, George has more than ever.

—Escanaba Iron Port: "Presented to Prof. G. M. Bice by the E. C. B. Nov. 26, 1887," is the legend engraved on the gold head of a fine ebony walking stick, and the legend tells the whole story. "E. C. B." means of course Escanaba City Band. The Professor did not authorize us to say so but the fact was patent that he was proud of the stick and pleased, clear through, with the feeling that dictated its purchase and presentation.

—Old settlers say that the mildness of the present winter reminds them very much of the winter of 1857-8. "Tradition" says that in that winter, after a slight freeze in November, there was no snow or ice throughout December, January and the first part of February. Again within our own recollection, occurred a very open winter—that of 1881-2. Lake Michigan did not freeze so but what vessels and steamers could have run the entire winter between Charlevoix and Milwaukee. There was very little snow, and no ice of any consequence was put up.

—An old Journalist says: A country editor is one who reads newspapers, writes on any subject, sticks type, folds papers, makes up mails, runs errands, saws wood, works in the garden, is blamed for a thousand things he never thought of, works hard all day, is subjected to spring fever, helps people into office who forget all about it afterwards, and very frequently gets cheated out of his earnings; he puffs up and does more to build up the town than anyone else, and the miser and fogy are benefitted, yet they will not take the paper, but will borrow it and read it, and cuss the editor.

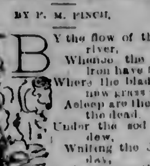
The Blue And the Gray.

BY F. M. FINCH.



BY the flow of the inland river,
Whence the fleets of iron have fled,
Where the blades of the new grass quiver,
Asleep are the ranks of the dead.
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the Judgment day,
Under the one the Blue,
Under the other the Gray.

These in the robing of glory,
Those in the gloom of defeat,
All with the battle-blood gory,
In the dusk of eternity meet.
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the Judgment Day,
Under the laurel the Blue,
Under the willow the Gray.

From the silence of sorrowful hours,
The desolate mourners go,
Lovingly laden with flowers,
Alike for the friend and the foe.
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the Judgment Day,
Under the roses the Blue,
Under the lilies the Gray.

So with an equal splendor
The morning sun-rays fall,
With a touch impartially tender,
On the blossoms blooming for all.
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the Judgment Day,
Broidered with gold the Blue,
Mellowed with gold the Gray.

So when the summer calleth,
On forest and field of grain,
With an equal murmur falleth
The cooling drip of the rain.
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the Judgment Day,
Wet with the rain the Blue,
Wet with the rain the Gray.

Sadly, but not upbraiding,
The generous deed was done,
In the storm of the years that are fading,
No braver battle was won.
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the Judgment day,
Under the blossoms the Blue,
Under the garland the Gray.

Fighting a Powerful Enemy.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

[NOTE.—I first heard the following strange incident told ten years ago, by Dr Charles N. Palmer, of Lockport, N. Y. At the time of the death of General Grant, the Doctor gave the details of it to the reporter of a local paper, who published them. I did not procure a copy, and, being unable to see the Doctor at this writing, I must depend entirely on my recollection, which does not preserve the number of the regiment, the arm of the service, or the State. But the main incident is related without the least embellishment, and it is more than likely that some of the veteran readers of THE CHICAGO LEDGER will have some knowledge of it. Knowing its author, I cannot doubt its truth; and it is strange enough to deserve a wide reading among the War Memories.]

I was surgeon of the regiment. It was the summer of 1864, and our armies were before Petersburg and Richmond. I found plenty to do, with the ordinary sickness of a regiment at ...

REMINISCENCES OF PUBLIC MEN.

BY BEN: PERLEY POORE.

Abraham Lincoln once told a good story about Henry Ward Beecher, who, dressed in very common clothes, was studying human nature as exhibited in the highways and byways of New York. In the course of his philosophic peregrinations, he went into a mock auction shop. He stood awhile on entering, and reflected, doubtless, how any one could be so lost to all sense of truth and honesty as the auctioneer in question, endeavoring to palm off his worthless trash to the inexperienced in city ways as good and valuable, and finally the auctioneer called out: "Mr. Beecher, why don't you bid?" He was greatly astonished, as can be imagined, at finding himself known in this place, and, as he had supposed, in his purposely careless dress. He immediately left, and started for the residence of one of the members of the church in the neighborhood, and requested him, ...

Value of Bogus Coin.

In the records of Mauchline sessions the following entry occurs under the date 1748: "Found in the box of good money, £156 7s. 6d. Scots, and of bad copper, £43 19s. 7d." And for many years afterward, when the Mauchline kirk box was opened, a similar fact was revealed. For every three pennies of good copper there were two of bad. The conclusion is forced on our mind that in olden times a large number of people kept their bad coppers for charitable purposes, so as to appear to be giving to the poor when they were not giving, and to be lending to the Lord when they were holding back, and the left hand doubtless knew on these occasions what the right hand did. "In 1764, we learn from a foot note, the kirk session of Kilmarnock thought fit that the minister exhort ...

A Domestic Episode in Which Woman Was the Victor.

[Southern Bivouac.]

Jim Akers was a small, tow-headed, knock-kneed man, with irregular teeth, which made his mouth look like a steel trap twisted out of plumb. His wife was a large, raw-boned woman, fully a head taller and fifty pounds heavier than Jim. She had a temper of a half-famished wild-cat, and no darky just "gettin' religion" was over half as much afraid of the devil as Jim was of her. He had reason to be. When she was fully on the warpath she breathed chained lightning, and flung cyclones from the tip of her tongue. Nor did she content herself with words only, however bitter and furious. She very often brushed the poor little wretch with a hickory until he felt as if he had borrowed his back of a saint fresh from the gridiron.

One bright, golden, delicious afternoon, in the latter part of May, Jim ...

CHARLEVOIX, DEC 21, 1887.

Republicans are "enthusing" all over the country.

George Washington Childs expresses his profound disappointment in the President's message. Mrs. Cleveland will please send back the cow.

The first great act of the President was marrying. His second was the issuing of the 2-cent green stamp—his third was his three column message on the subject of free trade.

Several bills for the restriction of immigration have bobbed up in both houses of Congress. But the chances are that at the end of the session they will die. The congressman proposes but delay proposes.

There is just one way for the United States free traders to compete with English manufacturers, and that is, reduce the pay of laborers in the United States. That will come before the people next year for a decision. Michigan can be set down at 30,000 Republican majority in 1888.

When foreign anarchists become fully convinced that this is a poor market for their ducks they will not be so anxious to build their nests over here. The hanging of the Chicago anarchists and the imprisonment of Herr Most give foreign dynamiters a first rate excuse for remaining where they are.

Congressman Burrows, of Michigan, proposes an amendment to the house rule by which the several thousand private bills that storm Congress like a cloud of Kansas grasshoppers will be winnowed. The bulk of legislation now relates to private claims, and the public business is smothered under them. Some reform is necessary.

Detroit Tribune: The west and south need protection to their industries more than ever. Protection will enable the west and south not only to develop and increase their manufactures already begun, but to establish new industries and build up better home markets. Free trade would defeat all this. There will never be a time in this country when many of its industries can prosper without protection. Every year new "infants" are born, and it is our duty to protect them.

The New York Times is generally regarded as a free trade paper, and one of Mr. Cleveland's most obedient mugwump supporters. In view of this the following paragraph from the Times may be considered somewhat of a confession: "If the protectionist factionists in the Democratic party carry out their own desires, or do what they have continually declared that they would do, Mr. Cleveland has done the one thing by which he could imperil the prospect of his own renomination."

"Beer and tobacco smoke" seem to have been the chief memorial offerings to the dead anarchists at the meetings of the live ones in Chicago lately. The most remarkable feature, however, was the evident excellent result of the execution. Capt. Black, the counsel for the anarchists, read a long essay, but hardly referred to the "martyrs," and Gloy, a once loud advocate of reforming society by blowing it to pieces, cooed of peaceful discussion and the power of the ballot as gentle as a sucking dove.

A recent phenomenon in central Illinois puzzles scientific and other people. After weeks of drouth, the streams and wells becoming exhausted, abundant water suddenly appeared, without rain or other visible source of supply. Water flowed freely from the streams, and even the shallowest wells were replenished. Where this water came from, and the cause of its sudden appearance are mysteries which no man can find out. Some religious people believe it was an answer to prayer. It is probable however, that the effect was produced by a subterranean disturbance similar to that of an earthquake shock.

Gen. Martin Beemas, attorney for a Chicago firm, lately completed a contract to apply a patent which possesses many elements of novelty to the barb wire fence of the X. I. T. cattle company, located in the pan handle of Texas. The patent is a process by which a constant current of electricity is passed either through barb wire or through a plain galvanized wire. The first contact is enough to prove to any animal that the fence is loaded. At present a barb wire fence surrounds the range in question and the current will be passed through the top wire. Telephonic communications can also be made from any point to headquarters by attaching a ground wire and a small telephone, one of which will be carried by each cowboy. Any break in the fence will also be noted at headquarters by the constant ringing of a bell.

The Governor has appointed Henry E. Stewart agent of the Board of Corrections and Charities for Grand Traverse county, vice Sprague.

The Secretary of the Treasury has appointed Thomas J. Bailey assistant keeper of the lighthouse at Big Point au Sauble, vice Condy Gallagher, removed.

There are over 30 business places in Gladstone, upper peninsula. There are in the place just 251 buildings, erected with but a few exceptions since July 1, costing $125,000.

The old Meech camps, up the Jordan river, which were to have been used by an East Jordan lumbering company this winter, were burned recently. The fire is believed to have been incendiary.

About 115,000,000 feet of lumber cut at Cheboygan the past season, being the largest ever recorded. It falls about 25,000,000 short of the amount anticipated, and is some 20,000,000 in excess of the cut of 1886.

Senator Stockbridge has introduced a bill to pay Thomas Chambers, of Mackinac, $3,651.56 for carrying the Canadian mails as contractor from Sault Ste. Marie to Mackinac from July 1, 1875, to June 30, 1879, he having contracted to carry only U. S. mail. A like bill was introduced in the last Congress, but failed to get through.

A Manistee special says: "Condy Gallagher, of Beaver Island, identified the body washed in by the waves and found on the beach here a week ago. It is that of his wife. The deceased was 40 years old, the mother of eight children, and was on her way to Chicago on the ill-fated Vernon. Mr. Gallagher leaves with the remains for his home.

At a recent meeting of the Bellaire Accident Association it was resolved to incorporate under the name of "The Bellaire Mutual Benefit Association," and the following officers were elected: President, Chas. L. Cleveland; Vice President, Henry Richardi; Secretary, Fred B. Zorn; Treasurer, James Dunn; Trustees, Louis Hofmann, Chas. Blume, T. N. Chapin.

The Toledo, Ann Arbor & North Michigan railroad is fast becoming one of the big railroads of this State. Early in the coming year it will have direct lines connecting Toledo, Muskegon, Saginaw and Cadillac, and will then, if no bad luck overtakes it, push on toward Mackinaw, and, perhaps, into the upper peninsula. The line from Durand to Saginaw is the only one not practically completed, and work on it will be rushed all winter.

Installation of officers of Emmet [Petoskey] Chapter, No. 104, R. A. M., will occur on Monday evening next. The officers elect are as follows: H. P., Clay E. Call; K., W. F. Lawton; Scribe, A. Thompson; C. H., S. B. Calkins; P. S., Will Searle; R. A. C., S. Thompson; Treas, James Buckley; Sec., B. W. Stark; G. M. 1st V., Liberty J. Ingalls; G. M. 2d V., W. S. Spencer; G. M. 3d V., A. J. Bachelder; Guard, D. Tripp.

The township of Star, Antrim county, in complying with the new law which commands each town to provide itself with an election seal, ordered carved upon the end of a stick the word STAR, believing that to be good enough for every day sort of folks. The artist who did the carving was not familiar with types, however, and that accounts for the fact that the local option returns from Star are sealed with the name of the town reversed—RATS. The township meant no disrespect.

Of interest in Northern Michigan: Judge Gridley, at Jackson, on application of Attorney General Taggart, on the 13th, issued a temporary injunction restraining the G. R. & I., J. L. & S., and F. & P. M. railroads from disposing of, or cutting the timber from certain swamp lands claimed to belong to the state, but which the railroads located under the provisions of the grants made at the time the roads were built. The amount of land aggregates 150,000 acres.

Bellaire Breeze: Many of the older residents of Antrim county who remember William Davis, more familiarly called "Billy," as a strapping young farmer who emigrated to southern Michigan some years ago, and who was burned out in the great fire which devastated Huron county in 1880, will be surprised to learn that he has allied himself to the Church of the Latter Day Saints, usually known as Mormon, and is now preaching the word to the unwashed infidels of North Michigan.

Cadillac News and Express: The Michigan Tradesman makes a very untruthful statement in regard to there being a deplorable condition of business in Cadillac, growing out of the slow payments made by the T. A. A. & C. R. R. Co., to the laborers constructing the road. The construction of the new railroad has been pushed forward to reach this city according to the requirements of the people of Cadillac, against many unforeseen difficulties that have been met by the managers. Arrangements have about been perfected whereby the railroad can promptly pay all its obligations here.

D. Chapin, who was captain of the log barricade forces in the recent railroad fight near Cadillac, has been arrested. There seems to be much sympathy in Osceola county for the Chapins, and it is said they were advised by friends to assert their right to the property. They believed themselves justified in using guns if necessary. Now, however, the prisoners begin to realize that they have done something of highly questionable legal propriety. Gus Helding, who was fatally wounded in the battle, was buried on the 13th. There were only a few railroad officials present at the funeral, which fact made some comment. Work on the Toledo, Ann Arbor & Cadillac road, over which the fight was held, is progressing as if nothing had happened.

Cheboygan Tribune: A vigorous search is being made to find and recover the flour and lard jetisoned by the propeller Albany. The poor man's castle is being invaded in search of a few barrels, and a close watch is being kept on parties supposed to have in possession a larger quantity. Monday evening they unearthed quite a number of barrels that had been hidden in a saw-dust pile at one of the saw mills. It is said the way the discovery was made was by watching the movements of a suspected party. Daily he was seen to walk up street and cast an anxious glance at the saw-dust pile. This led those interested in the discovery of the flour to suspect there was a "nigger" in the saw-dust, and an investigation led to the discovery of the flour.

Petoskey Record: On Saturday afternoon Mr. Millenhagen with his section men was fixing the sidewalk crossing over the track on Petoskey street so as to permit the use of the snow plow, when the body of a babe was discovered under the walk, in a large glass fruit can, tightly closed. In prying up the plank the crowbar had rested upon the jar and broken it. Mr. Millenhagen and his men were much startled, and did not know what to do, but seeing Dr. Winslow called him to examine the find. The doctor pronounced it the body of an infant, and upon his advice Mr. Millenhagen put it in a small box and buried it.——Last week Dr. A. G. Oven performed a fine operation for cataract on Mrs. Elizabeth Halpin of Hayes. She is doing nicely and will have restored vision.

It has just come to light that W. W. Cummer, of Cadillac, a wealthy lumberman well known over the State, while walking from the Muskegon river back to the Toledo, Ann Arbor & Cadillac road early last week, was mistaken for Superintendent Ashley and fired upon. He was alone and saw a man fire several shots in succession. The smoke floated between Mr. Cummer and the marksman, so he believes the shots were directed at himself. Upon subsequent inquiry it was learned that the man who had driven Mr. Ashley, Mr. Cummer and others over to the Muskegon river was asked at the point where the shooting occurred who the party were. He replied: "Mr. Ashley and some friends." It is presumed, judging from later developments, that this was a deliberate attempt to take Mr. Ashley's life, mistaking Mr. Cummer for him.

A CENTRAL SOUDAN TOWN.

Customs and Civilization of the People—Skill and Artistic Tastes Displayed.

In looking around we note the scrupulous cleanness of everything—the well-swept yard, the well-washed earthen-ware, cooking pots, and other kitchen utensils, the daintily carved calabashes for milk, water, and a variety of purposes. Here stands part of a tree hollowed into a mortar for pounding certain grains, and there a bedded course-grained stone, on which the family meal is ground. Everywhere are to be observed evidences of the thrift and industry which distinguish the Soudanese household. Unlike the domestic establishments of most Mohammedan parts, there is no pampered laziness or voluptuous ease. Wife and slave alike are busily engaged in household duties, or work which will bring money to the workers. Here is cotton being teased and cleaned, then with spindle and wheel turned into thread. Food simmers or boils on the fire in the various savory, if oily, dishes for which the Haussa women are famous. We note that no heavy or unwomanly tasks are laid upon the females. . . . In the store-rooms and master's apartments are to be seen a great variety of objects heaped together or lying about without any attempt at order. Here may be found the owner's weapons of war—many double-edged swords, with scabbards handsomely ornamented with leather and brass, and suspended by elaborate and betasseled silk ropes, daggers intended to be attached to the wrist by a leather band—the cross-shaped handle when thus carried almost lying in the palm of the hand—beautiful long iron spears neatly and prettily inlaid with brass bands, and generally barbed, revolvers and pistols of the most absolute types, as well as flint-lock guns which look as if they would be as dangerous to the user as they could possibly be to an enemy. Such are the offensive weapons. But there are also to be seen wardresses of enormously thick quilts, intended specially as a protection against poisoned arrows. The warrior when encased in these cumbersome garments looks the most unwieldy and barrel-like of African Falstaffs, as he can neither mount his horse nor dismount without assistance, and if unhorsed he is perfectly helpless. Many of the wealthy chiefs have also very beautiful coats of chain armor, with head-gear to match, which are probably of old Moorish workmanship, and are said by the natives to be as old as David, and are accordingly valued at a great price.

Besides the objects which savor of war, numbers of other things lying about in artistic disorder attract attention. Brass vessels are the most conspicuous, and indicate a manipulative skill and an artistic taste which we would certainly not expect in such a country. The chief types of native work are large circular salvers or trays, globular vessels, others carafe-like in form, urns resembling coffee-pots. They are all elaborately ornamented, either in repousse or chased in the intricate manner which characterizes Moorish art. Many of the designs are most beautiful, and worked out with patient care. In the brass-worker's art, as in so many other things, the influence of North African ideas is easily traceable, though how they have come to take such fixed root in the Soudan it would be difficult to say. Our wonder at the quaint and effective work is enhanced on learning that all these vessels are hammered out of brass rods, each two feet long and of the thickness of telegraph wire, in which form it reaches these parts from Europe.

The specimens of pottery which we see lying about exhibit a wonderful skill in that industry, considering that as yet they have not adopted the potter's wheel. The most extraordinary objects, however, which attract our attention are the skin vessels for holding oil. In some way or other they are moulded into the required forms out of raw hide, and so constructed as a single piece as hardly to show the slightest trace of a joint. They are not sewed, but the two edges of the skin are made to adhere most firmly by some means. The outer aspect is ornamented in black, white, and light brown strips of skin having those colors. The hair is left on except on the neck. They are ingeniously fitted with caps or lids to keep out any foreign matter. Only oil or grain is kept in them, as water softens the untanned skin. In some cases they are clearly intended more for ornament than use, as frequently four smaller vessels of the same pattern are attached to the chief one with the most happy and artistic effect.

One thing which we cannot fail to notice in looking round a Wurnu household of the "upper ten" is that the people have largely acquired æsthetic tastes, and delight to surround themselves with articles which please the eye, as well as with those which are merely useful; and to minister to this taste a score of industries have sprung up.—Joseph Thomson, in Harper's Magazine.

Wife—I don't see why women want to wear high hats, anyhow. Husband—Neither do I, my dear. Wife—Yes; it's perfectly senseless. They don't cost a bit more than the others, and some of them not nearly so much.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Dignified Drunkards.

Some people get very dignified when they get drunk. He had been out, and it was somewhat late when he came into the restaurant with the crowd. He leaned back in his chair and made several ineffectual attempts to dust a dark coffee-stain from the white shirt-front that was a trifle wrinkled.

"What will you eat?" somebody asked him. He straightened himself out and looked dignified, not to say severe. Then he fixed his solitary eye-glass in his eye, and said, in measured tones:

"I do not—I do not feel in a condition to suggest anything original—but I am—I'm prepared to follow up any suggestions that may be offered."

I met a millionaire one evening coming down the street very unsteadily. He was walking very fast, but the night had been heavy and his numerous tacks made the block long and difficult to cover. I hailed him. He greeted me kindly. He looked at me for a moment.

"I am sorry, sorry to see you in this condition," he said.

"I am all right."

"Well, I am not. I know I am a trifle full——"

"That doesn't matter in you, you know. You're a man of wealth and position."

"That," he said very seriously—"that did not occur to me."

Then he braced himself up and walked on with great dignity.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Mineral Statistics.

The reports of the United States Geological Survey show a handsome gain in the production of coal, lead, and zinc, with a decrease in the yield of copper, for last last year, as compared with the one next preceding. The production of coal was 32,761,710 short tons of Pennsylvania anthracite and 71,985,731 tons of all other coal, including small quantities of anthracite tained in Arkansas and Colorado. The increase over 1885 was 1,785,881 tons, or a little more than $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, which, however, is somewhat less than the augment in population. The value at the mines is set down as about $1,420,000 less for last year on account of decline in price, which averaged not far from 9 per cent. The production of lead is given as 135,629 tons, against 129,412 in 1885, and of spelter 42,641 tons, against 40,688 the preceding year. In copper the domestic production was 156,373,521 pounds, against 155,875,766 in 1885. Of this total for last year the mines of Lake Superior contributed about one-half, showing a handsome gain, while there was a large falling off in the output from Arizona and Montana, due to the difficulty of competing with the product of the lake region. The consumption of copper by domestic manufacturers shows the phenomenal increase of nearly 23 per cent, much of which was due to the development of extraordinary activity among the wire drawers. The exports of copper for last year were 19,501,087 pounds.

Complexion and Health.

A physician in the Medical World gives the following advice to women for the improvement of their health and complexion: "For the present I prescribe only for your feet. First, produce a quantity of woolen stockings, not such as you buy at the store under the name of lamb's wool, that you can read a newspaper through, but the kind that your aunt Jerusha in the country knits for you, that will keep your feet dry and warm, in spite of the wind and weather; second, if you want to go through, change them every morning, hanging the fresh ones by the fire during the night; third, produce thick calfskin boots, double uppers and triple soles and wear them from the 1st of October to the 1st of May; make frequent applications of some good oil blacking; fourth, avoid rubbers altogether, except a pair of rubber boots, which may be worn for a little time through the snow-drifts or a flood of water; fifth, hold the bottoms of your feet in cold water a quarter of an inch deep just before going to bed two or three minutes, and then rub them hard with rough towels and your naked hands; sixth, to go out freely in all weather, and believe me, not only will your feet enjoy a good circulation, but as the consequences of the good circulation in the lower extremities your head will be relieved of all its fulness and your heart of all its palpitations. Your complexion will be greatly improved and your health made better in every respect.

It is related that some Americans recently going through the Jardine des Plantes of Paris stopped to look at a big rattlesnake in a cage. It lay motionless, apparently asleep, but when two of the party behind began to speak in English it moved, lifted its head and gave every sign of interest. They told their companions that the snake understood English. The whole party then returned to the cage. The snake was apparently asleep again. They conversed in French, but the snake made no movement; then the ladies began to speak in English. The snake started, lifted its head, and showed the same alertness as before at the sounds. The rattlesnake proved on inquiry to have come from Virginia.

Suicide of Scorpions.

W. Curran writes to the Lancet: "Dr. Bourne's experiments on these creatures have been long since substantially discounted by me. My object in making experiments was to test Goldsmith's assertion that if a scorpion is placed in the midst of a circle of burning charcoal . . . it stings itself on the back of the head, and in this manner the undaunted suicide instantly expires.' It does nothing of the kind. As to Byron's more glowing description or episode:

> The mind that broods o'er guilty woes
> Is like the scorpion girt by fire.
> . . . . .
> One sad and sole relief she knows—
> The sting she nourished for her foes
> Whose venom never yet was vain,
> Gives but one pang and cures all pain,
> And darts into her desperate brain;

and so, it would appear, shuffles off the mortal coil, along with all its throes and woes, etc.—again I say it does nothing of the kind. On the contrary, and as the outcome of hundreds of these experiments—experiments that were carried on by me in the presence or with the co-operation of a score or more of still living officers, not only at the Jumari ball practice ground at Cawnpore, but also in sundry hill and cholera camps elsewhere in India—I came to the conclusion that this belief or superstition was entirely erroneous. I came to the further conclusion that its poison was all but inert, not only on itself, but also on small birds, bees, etc.; and as to its own individual behavior in presence of fire, it was both stupid and cowardly. It either slunk away into any corner it could either make or find, or, moving about aimlessly within this circle, it either perished in the same or died without making any sign inside it.'

Expending the Surplus.

The reported sale of the Vandalia Railroad has started the tongues of the railroad reminiscents.

"I remember," said one "when the Vandalia car-wheels were kept painted red, and were wiped at every station. This was under the regime of President Peek. You see the Vandalia was earning too much money in those days and some of the surplus had to be expended."

"Why earning too much?"

"Under the charter, the road was obliged to turn over to the school fund all net earnings in excess of 8 per cent. As a matter of fact the company was earning from 10 to 20, and the State authorities demanded that the surplus be applied in accordance with the charter. There was no way to find out just how much should go to the school fund, but suits were instituted against the road for recovery of certain amounts. The management probably concluded that the earnings must be reduced—at any rate the number of employes was increased at all the principal stations and whenever a train came in you would see an army of wheel-wipers dart under the cars and begin to polish the red paint. The wheels were kept as clean as the engine-drivers. There was a report at that time that the tracks were washed with soap every evening, the ties were whitewashed weekly, and the track swept with house brooms. The earnings were thus judiciously held down to the 8 per cent limit, and so far as I know the road never paid enough money into the school fund to buy a Pollard warrant. To this day I believe the road by some inscrutable sagacity earns just enough to pay the stockholders 8 per cent and the school fund—nix."—Indianapolis News.

Mamie's Cablegram.

A Hartford man whose wife was going abroad, asked her to telegraph him a word or two letting him know of her safe arrival in New York. In a few hours he received the following message, "collect."

"DEAR GEORGE: Arrived here safely at fifteen minutes after 6. The train was due at 6, but we were delayed fifteen minutes while en route. Had a perfectly lovely trip. Don't worry about me, I'll get along all right. And take good care of yourself. Be so careful about taking cold this damp weather. Remember you are to keep on your flannels until the 15th of June. Be sure and have the house open and aired as often as once a week. Remember what I told you about your socks and shirts. Don't forget to keep the basement door locked. Write every day. I'm sure I'll have a lovely time. So good in you to let me go. You must come over after me in August. Forever and ever and over yours, MAMIE.

An hour later Mamie was pained to receive the following reply to her "word or two:"

"Don't cable anything from Liverpool. I'm a ruined man if you do. GEORGE."

Said an old bachelor: "After boarding in a good many different houses I have come to the conclusion that where the table is wretched the people are amusing and jovial. Where it is good the boarders are apt to be more than ordinarily stupid and uninteresting. I account for the fact on the well known physiological principle that a full stomach makes a stupid brain." "What a full stomach yours must be then," said his landlady's daughter who chanced to overhear his remark.

Reed, druggist, of Winchester, Ind., writes: "One of my customers, Mrs. Louisa Pike, Bartonia, Randolph Co., Ind., was a long sufferer with Consumption, and was given up to die by her physicians. She heard of Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, and began buying it of me. In six months' time she walked to this city, a distance of six miles, and is now so much improved she has quit using it. She feels she owes her life to it." Free Trial Bottles at Dr. G. W. Crouter's

MR. FAIRCHILD'S REPORT.

Echoing the President's Sentiments, He Urges Congress to Reduce the Surplus—Whisky and Tobacco Need Not Go Free.

CONTRARY to usual custom, the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury was not sent to Congress this year until the day after the President's message had been read. It is a very lengthy paper, and we have space for only a short synopsis. The report shows that the receipts of the Government for the last fiscal year were $371,403,277, and the expenditures $315,835,428. There was an increase in the receipts of $14,363,550 over those of the preceding year, and the expenditures were increased by $25,113,011. The revenues for the present year are estimated at $383,000,000, and the expenditures at $316,817,785. The Secretary advises a reduction of the customs duties on the lines suggested in the President's message. The Secretary gives three ways in which the receipts and expenditures of the Government may be made about equal: [illegible]

He thinks the patient's life might possibly be prolonged by the removal of the larynx, but he doubts the advisability of an operation which is more than likely to prove fatal, and which, if successful, would arrest the progress of the disease for a short time only.

To the Congress of the United States:

You are confronted at the threshold of your legislative duties with a condition of the national finances which imperatively demands immediate and careful consideration.

The amount of money annually exacted, through the operation of present laws, from the industries and necessities of the people, largely exceeds the sum necessary to meet the expenses of the Government.

When we consider that the theory of our institutions guarantees to every citizen the full enjoyment of all the fruits of his industry and enterprise, with only such deduction as may be his share toward the careful and economical maintenance of the Government which protects him, it is plain that the exaction of more than this is [illegible]

CONGRESSIONAL.

Work of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

AT the caucus of Democratic Congressmen in Washington Saturday night, the 3d inst., Mr. Carlisle was renominated for Speaker, General Clark for Clerk, and John F. Leedom for Sergeant-at-arms. There was a contest over the nomination of Doorkeeper, in which Breckinridge of Arkansas and Blount of Georgia came to blows. Donelson of Tennessee, the present incumbent, and A. B. Hurt of Mississippi were the candidates. Breckinridge opened the fight in caucus by a vigorous attack upon Donelson's personal and official record, and was replied to by Blount and others. In the course of Breckinridge's reply he expressed surprise that any gentleman should continue to support Donelson, knowing his record. Blount, who was standing near, planted a square blow upon the nose of the little Arkansas member, and brought the blood. Breckinridge promptly resented this by a blow that skinned Blount's cheek-bone. The combatants strove to continue the fight, but only succeeded in battering pretty badly Mr. Hinck, of Maryland, who had stepped between them. Tarsney, of Michigan, and Randall came to the rescue, and after the pugilists were separated and the excitement had subsided the affair was amicably arranged and the discussion proceeded. Hurt was finally chosen. Mr. Milburn, the blind preacher, was renominated for Chaplain. The Republican Congressional caucus nominated Mr. Reed, of Maine, as their candidate for the Speakership. Dr. Talmage Makes a Spiritual Diagnosis—Our Nature All Awrist and Askew and Unjointed—The More We Think About Heavenly Things the Better.

BROOKLYN, Dec. 4.—This is sacramental day in Brooklyn Tabernacle. The more than 4,000 communicant members and many strangers from all parts of the world make it a memorable scene. New members were received and some of them were baptized this morning.

The congregation, led by organ and cornet, sang:

Dear dying Lamb, thy precious blood
Shall never lose its power
Till all the ransomed church of God
Be saved to sin no more.

The Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., preached. His subject was "Salutation from the Chariot," and his text II. Kings x. 15: "Is thine heart right?"

With mettled horses at full speed, for he was celebrated for fast driving, John, the warrior and king, returns from battle. But seeing Jehonadab, an acquaintance, by the wayside, he shouts "Whoa! whoa!" to the lathered span. [illegible]

... stupendous interests of an unending eternity. No wonder His back bent. No wonder the blood started from every pore. No wonder that He crouched under a torture that made the sun faint, and the everlasting hills tremble, and the dead rush up in their winding sheets as He cried, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." But the cup did not pass. None to comfort.

There He hangs! What has that hand done that it should be thus crushed in the palm? It has been healing the lame and wiping away tears. What has that foot been doing that it should be so lacerated? It has been going about doing good. Of what has the victim been guilty? Guilty of saving a world. Tell me, ye heavens and earth, was there ever such another criminal? On that hill of carnage, that sunless day, amid those howling rioters, may not your sins and mine have perished? I believe it.

Oh, the ransom has been paid. Those arms of Jesus were stretched out so wide that when he brought them together again they might embrace the world. Oh that I might, out of the blossoms of the spring, or the flaming foliage of the autumn, make one wreath for my Lord! Oh, that all the triumphal arches of the world could be swung in one gateway, where the King of Glory might come in! Oh, that all the harps and trumpets and organs of earthly music might, in one anthem, speak His praise!

But what were earthly flowers to Him [illegible]

[New York Evening Post, Mugwump.]

President Cleveland's first message to the Fiftieth Congress is the most courageous document that has been sent from the Executive Mansion since the close of the war. In order to make an impression on the public mind on the most important, if not the only important, topic of public concern, it was necessary to present that subject without other entanglement. The gun that has been fired will be heard in every corner and hamlet of the country. For his splendid courage in "taking the bull by the horns" he will win the praise of all who admire manliness and straightforwardness in public station, whether they approve his views or not.

[New York Mail and Express, Ind.]

The President has framed the issue for next year's campaign, and that is a revision of the tariff. The President has taken a courageous stand, and we sincerely trust that his party will uphold him. He has put the Democrats fairly on the free trade platform, and the country will recognize the fitness of the position. The Republicans will enter upon the campaign with courage and confidence.

[Philadelphia Press, Rep.]

A thousand thanks to President Cleveland for the bold, manly, and unequivocal avowal of his extreme free trade purposes. And a thousand rebukes and defeats for the false, dangerous, and destructive policy which he thus frankly and unreservedly proclaims. The message deserves all the glory of courage, all the praise of high public issue, all the condemnation of utter ruinous heresy. It is a surprise in its method, and a still greater surprise in its matter. It comes like the sudden, echoing boom of a great gun [illegible]

Over the prairie swept a party of [illegible]

... urge that lazy critter into a brisker gallop. We've got many miles before us that must be gone over before dawn."

Skete—for it was he—turned one long, despairing glance over his shoulder in the direction from whence a small bright light appeared far in the east, which his tortured mind realized was the still burning ranch of his old master—his loved, betrayed master, that he had served so long and well until now. Yet he had little imagined that the band of desperadoes had other intentions than robbery when he, in unwilling terror, opened the door for their admittance. Not until compelled to mount and accompany them, and when more than a mile away, did he perceive the raging flames of the ranch and surrounding buildings that were of a nature to be set on fire. Then his awakened senses began to realize the enormity of his work, and he moaned in anguish. But even now the voice of Jim Gregory could strike terror to his timid heart, for he knew that to "make a shooting mark" of a poor old darky would be a small affair to him. The mystery was that he hadn't dispatched him ere this; but Jim, the leader of that half-dozen desperate men, had a reason for preserving Skete's black skin known only to himself.

On they pressed, mile after mile being left behind. Skete had seldom been out of sight of his home since he had lived in Nebraska, nevertheless he felt pretty certain that their direction was northwest, and that the stream of water they were never far from was the North Platte. The country was desolate in appearance; the muddy river, the numerous sand-hills, and the sparsely scattered bunches of buffalo grass were not calculated to inspire one with other than gloomy thoughts.

Dawn broke at last, and the country was still barren in appearance. A brisk wind sent sand and dirt hither and thither in blinding confusion. A real, genuine Nebraska "blow" was upon them, and a real, genuine Western storm was not far off.

"We must find shelter soon, or we will be caught in a storm of no small magnitude. There's some friendly bluffs slightly to our west; let's break for them, boys. Hurry up!"

The tired ponies were urged once more, and the bluffs were reached in time to be a partial shelter from the sharp wind and cold, piercing rain. The threatened storm had broken at last.

The storm lasted some five hours, when the clouds parted and the bright, cheerful sun smiled down over that far-reaching plain. The ponies were tethered for a short time to allow them to eat a few mouthfuls of the buffalo grass, and then their journey was resumed once more.

For two days and nights they pressed forward as rapidly as possible; then, when poor old Skete was beginning to be so stiff and weary he could hardly keep on the pony's back, they entered a more broken country, with the grand old mountains in the distance.

Skete felt a thrill of delight as his eyes beheld those lofty heights.

Virginia, dear old Virginia, was recalled so vividly that he almost exclaimed out loud, "Bress de Lor'," for Skete detested the monotonous plains of Nebraska, and his heart lingered for the hills of his native home.

As the sun was creeping behind the mountains the party entered a lovely valley, sheltered on every side by towering mountains. Here a scene of novelty and comfort greeted them.

Tents were scattered about and children were playing here and there. Lazy cattle and sheep nibbled the green grass along the mountain stream, and fires, over which swung kettles, were in numerous places.

Several dusky specimens of mankind issued as ut; some four or five approached them as they rode up.

"We have come according to promise, Bald Eagle. Have the other parties arrived yet?" exclaimed Jim Gregory.

The young chief addressed as Bald Eagle replied in excellent English:

"Yes, they have been waiting the coming of their white brothers long."

"The ranch is many miles off, or was," laughed Jim, heartlessly, "and we have made the best time possible. Take that nigger off, boys, let him cook us a good supper. I dare say he knows how. I will go and report to Iron Dan at once. I bring him splendid news and we are all to be well paid."

The men were silent, but more than one face looked dissatisfied and as if in doubt as to their share of the spoils.

Evidently Jim Gregory was on friendly terms with the Indians, for only a few gave him more than a passing glance as he strode through their village.

To the right, in the shadow of a cluster of trees, with tall mountain pines reaching their dark green arms just beyond them, two men in the Western garb of buckskin and corduroy lazily smoked their pipes. The darker and heavier leaped to his feet the moment he beheld the approach of Bald Eagle and his companion.

"Ah! you have come! What success?"

"Good; we ransacked the ranch, stopped old Fairleigh's disturbed dreams with a knife, set the whole shebang on fire, and here we are. Here's the money and the papers—all we could find."

"You are sure he is—dead?"

"Very sure; you made a special point of that in your orders," brutally.

"Yes; nothing could be accomplished while he lived; but the girl, what of her; you didn't kill her, also?"

Jim Gregory shrugged his shoulders and laughed heartlessly.

"No; that is, we gave her a chance for her life. We merely set the ranch on fire, left her sweetly sleeping, and skedaddled with the old nigger, as you requested."

"Then she may have perished——"

"Don't think it's likely; too many cowboys around over the country. Some one on 'em got there in time to pull her out."

"I had no desire for her death; she could not interfere with my plans—yes, these papers are all right—you have succeeded well; the money you can have for your share, and Ned's here, and the other boys; divide it between you."

"Yes, these papers are all right."

"Have you no further orders, Captain?"

"Not at this moment. I want to think a while; in the morning I will have other work ready, no doubt."

The men drew off, leaving Iron Dan alone with his thoughts.

His dark, evil face glowed with an exultant joy as he examined the papers he held. "Ah!" he muttered, "at last, fair cousin; at last we are even. The trump cards are in my hands now. You sent me to the devil, and made me what I am. Now, my time has come. What delight it will be to tell you how he perished and that all his vast wealth is mine!"

CHAPTER III.

When Nora Fairleigh began to fully realize what had befallen her she glanced piteously about her.

The handsome young stranger was the first to approach with words of comfort.

"If you please, Miss," he said, kindly, "my horse is here, quite safe, I assure you, and I can obtain another and will gladly escort you to North Platte; for you can not remain here; the fire has made a waste of everything, and there is a storm gathering that will break by dawn, if not sooner. Come; many kind friends await you, I assure you."

Nora glanced at him, with her eyes full of anguish, and replied:

"Friends! I haven't a friend in the world. We lived here alone, seeing no one scarcely."

"But I think you forget there is One who never forsakes us."

"Yes, our Savior. May He help me to bear this great sorrow. You are very kind, sir, and I thank you. I will accompany you as you request; when I am calmer I will be better prepared to look the world in the face. I wonder how the fire originated?"

"Not from accident, I am certain; I examined the ground. A party of five or six men have been here."

"But you don't think——?"

"I am not prepared to say, positively; but this night's work shall be ferreted out, I assure you, dear Miss Fairleigh, and your father's cowardly murderers brought to justice. Don't look so white; try to bear it. Here are the horses, ready for our journey. Shall I help you to mount?"

Just as the storm broke in all its fury Nora entered the hotel and was tenderly led to her room by one of the maids.

As she parted from her new-found friend he said, softly and kindly:

"Rest for a few days; then, if I can be of any assistance, let me know. My name is Lester Gray. I am stopping here for the present."

When Nora was alone in her room she drew from her pocket a small purse and, pouring its contents in her lap, counted it over.

"Only twenty dollars. Papa did not think I would need more. Ah, me! if I could only hear if he—if—he is really dead, or what. I feel that he must have perished when I could scarcely escape from the lower room. And poor Skete! Alas! if he was but alive I would not feel so lonely. Why did they wish to murder papa? The money! Ah! I had forgotten that."

She remembered the name of a lawyer that had done business for her father, and sent for him at once.

Mr. Lee Swift, a tall, stylish, elderly gentleman, with an exceedingly cold face and manner, made his appearance that evening.

"You sent for me, Miss Fairleigh. I am truly sorry to learn of your great loss. I only heard of it at noon."

"I thought you were papa's friend, and I knew no one——"

"Ah, yes, poor man!"

"Have you heard anything positively?"

For the first time the man's face showed something of pity.

"Yes, they found the bones of one man—and something—some knife or watch—the latter, I believe, that two of the cowboys identified as your father's."

"I haven't a friend in the world."

"Then he is dead," she sobbed, "and—and Skete?"

"He must have escaped; the boys say he was an arrant coward; he fled in terror no doubt, and is hiding in the plains."

Nora shook her head slightly.

"Yes, he was a coward, but he loved papa and I too well to desert us wholly; if he escaped he will return to me before many days. I wish, Mr. Swift, you would make some efforts to discover who those cowardly robbers and murderers were. Papa certainly left considerable property and—and I would wish a big reward offered."

"By all means, Miss Fairleigh, I will do whatever you wish. Your father did leave a very handsome fortune, which, of course, is now yours. Unluckily all his papers are destroyed, but I apprehend no serious trouble. I will arrange money in the bank that you can draw at your own convenience. Here are some blank checks, and now I will bid you good evening, promising to call to-morrow and inform you what success I am having."

When he called the next day he found Nora somewhat calmer and looking exceedingly lovely in her new black dress, whose soft artistic folds rendered the country maiden into an elegant, gentle appearing lady, though the sweet face was unchanged except from the great shadow that rested upon it.

"I called to inform you that I telegraphed to Denver for one of the best detectives in the country, and he will reach here in a day or two. I have learned nothing further. I will take what measures I think best in regard to your father's estate. In the meantime rest and try to grieve as little as possible. This world is a world of trouble at best."

Two more days passed quietly, the obsequies of the dead were over, and Nora sat sadly by her window when a caller was announced.

"Mr. Dan Le Fane."

The name was unfamiliar, but supposing him to be the expected detective, Nora ordered him shown up at once.

She received him in her private parlor, and as the dark-browed man first beheld her face he started back and turned slightly pale; only his own heart knew who it was her face recalled, but the next moment he was himself again, cold, cruel, desperate, and revengeful.

"Miss Fairleigh, I presume."

Nora bowed and replied: "Be seated, please."

The man took the chair opposite her with easy grace, and his bold, black eyes scrutinized her fair face; he smiled to himself when he remembered the object of his visit.

Making Them Tired.

Judge R. M. Romhorn, of Georgia, explodes Donnelly's theory that Bacon wrote the plays that are going the rounds of the stage credited to Shakspeare. In a letter to the editor of this paper the Judge says: "Why, it is foolishness to say that Shakspeare hadn't enough education to write 'em. Livin' right here in this neighborhood there's a fellow named Lew Lawrence that never went to school a day in his life, an' he can write a better hand now than Cal Watkins, one of the best lawyers we've got; an' so far as that's consarned, evil-minded fellers might say because I never went through no high fa'lutin' college—that I didn't write my opinion in the Moseby steer case. It makes me mad to see people pitchin' into a feller jest because he never neglected more pressin' duties to fool with professors an' sich. Shakspeare came to our town some time ago an' played his Hamlet in our new court-house, an' he talked well, too. I didn't know who he was 'till somebody 'lowed it was Shakspeare. He mout have been a abolitionist befo' the war an' all that, but the time has come fur drappin' all sich foolishness. Fust thing Donnelly knows he'll git a slander suit on his hands. Talkin' about cypherin'. W'y I know a feller that never seed the inside of a school-house that ken cypher all around Donnelly. A man ken l'arn 'rithmetic outen school about as well as he ken in it. When it comes to that, w'y thar ain't a man in this neighborhood that kon beat me multiplyin' and dividin'; an' I ken measure a hog an' come mighty nigh figgerin' up what he'll weigh. Tell that feller Donnelly that he's makin' these folks down here mighty tired."—Arkansaw Traveler.

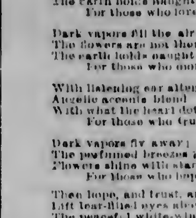
General Grant's Coolness.



"General Grant," said Captain E. N. K. Talcott, of Chicago, in speaking of the military experience which brought him in contact with the commander, "had the best memory, was the most level-headed and quiet, and the ablest man I ever met."

During the close of the operations about Richmond Captain Talcott was in charge of the engineer depot at the Bermuda Hundreds, from which the wants of the great vise which was slowly closed upon Lee by Grant were supplied, and his position brought him in constant contact both with headquarters and the General. Like every other man whom I have ever met who had come in contact with General Grant in action, he was impressed with the extraordinarily quick perception with which he seized every incident.

"While I was on General Foster's staff," said Captain Talcott, "General Grant once came to our line with his staff, and we all stood on a little knoll opposite which was a Confederate battery, the number of whose guns General Grant wanted to find out, in order to learn what it would cost to take it. Instead of leaving a staff officer to count the flashes of the guns, as almost any other man would have done, he stood on the knoll and began watching them. Of course, as soon as he stepped there General Foster went there, Grant's personal staff followed him and General Foster's personal staff stepped alongside of their commander. This made the prettiest mark you ever saw. We were near enough for the battery to see that we were officers. It was a large group of officers, and while the shells were going over Grant's head when he stepped there, it was not very long before they began to get the range, and pretty soon a shell struck the ground and threw sand all over us. By this time Rawlins, who was always anxious over his chief, said:

"'General, this is too exposed a position for you to stand in.'

"'Well,' said Grant, without taking the cigar out of his teeth or turning his head as he watched the flashes, 'if you don't like it you had better get down under the knoll.'

"Gen. Rawlins did not move, and another shell reminded everybody that the battery was getting the range very closely. 'You gentlemen,' said Grant, again without turning, 'have nothing to do up here and I guess you had better get under cover at once.' And, waiting a moment longer until he had settled the number of the battery to his satisfaction, Grant went back alone to the shelter of the knoll.

"At another time, in the closing operations around Petersburg, it happened that I was with the Tenth Corps, General Terry's, which was in action with its right resting on General Hancock's, the Second. Between the two ran a deep ravine, at the head of which was a Confederate battery, and as the fire of the battery commanded the ravine the entire length, it had not been considered possible for the troops to stand at the bottom of the ravine under fire. General Grant rode up and said to General Terry: 'What does this mean? Why aren't these lines connected? They will sweep right in here and turn you right and left.' General Terry explained the circumstances at some length, but Grant, who had been watching the ravine, interrupted him to say, 'What troops have you got here?'

"'The One-hundredth New York,' said General Terry.

"'Colonel Dandy's regiment. Send him here,' said Grant. Now Dandy was a West-Pointer and a whooper. He rode up and saluted as General Grant said:

"'I want you to take your regiment down and connect these lines in that ravine.' Colonel Dandy saluted again, with, 'Certainly, sir,' formed his regiment as if he was going out on dress parade, colors in the center, and swung down into the ravine under fire of the battery, and when the work was over rode back, with another salute.

"'The lines are connected, sir!'

"'How many men did you lose?' asked General Grant.

"'None, sir,' said Colonel Dandy.

"'I thought so,' replied General Grant.

"And then every one saw what Grant had seen as he rode up and looked over the field—the twigs which were falling from the trees under the fire of shot and shell from the Confederate battery only came from the top branches. The battery was firing over the ravine, and the men once marched into its bed were as safe there as anywhere in the line.

A Woman's Ruse.

A few years before the war, writes Herbert J. Tillspaugh in the National Tribune, Polly McR——, with her husband, left her pleasant home in New York and moved to Missouri. At the breaking out of the war Polly found herself surrounded on all hands by Southern sympathizers, but she clung unflinchingly to the Union. As her husband was away from home much of the time, her position was not an enviable one. Many threats were made against her, but as her courage and strength were decidedly herculean, he had received no harm.

Among the many comforts with which they were surrounded in their new home were several swarms of bees, and in them Polly took great pride. One pleasant afternoon, glancing across the prairie, Polly saw a sight which would have struck terror to a less brave heart than hers. Galloping directly toward her door was a company of Confederate cavalry. As she saw them approach nearer and nearer, she stepped calmly out of doors, and when they arrived was busying herself about the yard.

The leader drew rein within a few feet of her, and gruffly commanded her to "Git out what grub you've got, and tell where that husband of yourn is." Polly listened calmly while he was talking, and then said: "I will call my husband and get you something to eat." As she spoke she stepped back a few paces directly toward the bee-hives. Then, turning like a flash, she seized the nearest, whirled it over her head, flung it directly at the leader's horse, and ran into the house.

The maddened bees immediately began an assault against which swords and carbines were no defense, and as there was no controlling the maddened horses, the only alternative was an ignominious retreat. When Polly went out to bid adieu to the "Johnny Rebs," only a blue streak of profanity marked the route of retreat.

The silver threads are now beginning to show among the raven in Polly's hair, but she enjoys telling the story now as well as when she enjoyed the thought that her ruse was so successful, and that she had accomplished more perhaps than would a company of men.

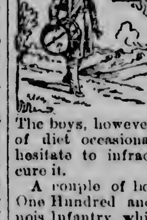
Couldn't Carry the Whole Hog.



Many interesting stories are related of foraging expeditions. In certain contingencies they were done at the order of the authorities, but, as a general thing, petty foraging was in violation of the army rules. The boys, however, desired a change of diet occasionally, and would not hesitate to infract the rules to procure it.

A couple of boys belonging to the One Hundred and Twenty-fourth Illinois Infantry, while that regiment was on a march near Holly Springs, Miss., had an amusing experience on a little foraging trip. As the train was slowly jogging along, they made a circuit through the adjacent country to see if they could not gather a little provender. They rode for several miles through the already over-foraged country without finding anything. At last they reined up in front of an antiquated frame cottage, where they learned from an old negro that some pigs, a few months old, had just been "done cleaned," and he led the way to where they were hanging. One of the boys took a pig and rolled it up in a rubber blanket and held it on in front of his saddle. The other one captured a sack of dried apples, and off they started. The pig being newly dressed was reasonably slippery and difficult to carry across the horse's neck, and occasionally slipped to the ground. The soldier with the apples would strike the other horse, which would make a lunge, and off would go the pig. After getting off and reloading the pig several times, he finally rode off and left it lying by the side of the road. Becoming hungry they made a detour and got something to eat at a farm house, and hurried on after the column. During the afternoon they fell in with an artillery man with two fresh hams tied together and hanging across his horse's neck. On being asked where he got them he replied: "About a half mile back yonder some blank fool tried to carry off a whole hog, but failed, and left it lying on the side of the road. He was evidently a raw recruit or he would have known better than to steal more than he could carry."

A Child of Nature.

Some of the inhabitants of the mountain regions of the South during the war were found almost in a state of nature, very ignorant and degraded.

On one occasion, while our army was crossing one of these upheavals, the chaplain made it his business to call at the hovels of these mountaineers and investigate their social condition. Noting a very dilapidated-looking cabin on the mountain side, the chaplain rode up in front of it, when a half dozen tow-heads peered around the door-frame at him. Among the progeny was a girl almost grown, ragged, dirty, and devoid of feminine adornments, being clothed in a sort of dirty frock and an old pair of butternut pants.

"How old are you?" inquired the chaplain.

"Dunno," she replied; "ax mother, thare; 'spect she can tell yer."

"Did you ever attend school?" she was asked.

"No, I never saw a school. What is it?"

"Can you read?" asked the chaplain.

"No, I can't read. Mebby I could learn—know some letters."

"Do you go to Sunday-school or church?"

"Wall, I heard tell of Sunday and church over by Big Land, but dunno nuthen 'bout 'em."

"Do you know who made you?" continued the chaplain.

"Dunno who made me. Ax mother over thare. She knows more 'bout me than I do, I guess."

"Don't you know that God made you and made all things? Did no one ever tell you of God and his goodness?"

"Hearn tell of God, but never saw him. Did you ever see God? Guess he never was around these parts," said the girl, as she scratched her back against the chimb of the door and peered at the chaplain through her frowzy hair.

As the chaplain moved away he heard the mother remark: "Bet my livers that's one ob dem fellers that preach to the Yankey soldiers. Wouldn't been safe fo' him to come up here fo' de wah."

No Honey for Supper.

After Sherman had taken Atlanta and started on his ever to be remembered march to the sea, foraging soon became the order of the day with most of us. Not satisfied with fresh beef and pork, and often poultry of different kinds, we were, as the boys expressed it, continually trying to "strike" something new. I remember, one evening, several men of Wilder's Mounted Infantry had strayed from the main line for the purpose of hunting something new to add to our larder, and several hogs were seen on the road; but as we had plenty of meat we let them feed in peace. Finally, we rode up to a large farm house that stood about one hundred yards from the road. We had to open a gate and ride up a narrow lane, and as we neared the house one of the boys, by the name of Knight, discovered several stands of bees in the orchard front of the house. There appeared to be no men about the place; but there were three women sitting in the front room. Knight walked up to the door and politely asked them if they had any butter and milk on the place. The women were Confederates to the core, and they informed Knight in no very gentle words that they had none for him, or any other "infernal Yank." This made Knight angry, and, turning to the boys who were waiting outside the gate, his eye caught sight of the bee stands, and he proposed that they have some honey for supper. They all agreed, while the women vigorously objected. But how to get it was the question, as we all knew that bees will fight for their rights; but Knight said he was an old bee-hunter and could manage that. Said he, "You boys open the gate so that I can get through, and then get back out of the way and I will throw the stand on my shoulder with the bottom toward the house. The bees will all fly out and go back where the stand sits." We did as directed, and then the fun commenced. Knight grabbed the stand and threw it on his shoulder and started to run. But the bees didn't seem to want to do as he said they would. Instead of going back where the stand sat they filled the air and swarmed over Knight, who ran as he never ran before. The rest of us were too much occupied with him to think of our own safety until it was too late, for Knight ran toward us, and, with a yell like a Comanche Indian, dropped the stand within ten steps of where we were sitting on our horses. Then commenced a scene that beggars description. Men cursing, horses running, and the women screaming for Jeff Davis and the bees. The boys were awful angry, as they had all they could attend to and none of the fun. When they got rid of their tormentors, a more sorrowful-looking group never rode into camp. Their eyes were swelled shut, noses and ears a world too large for them. They lost confidence in Knight as a bee-hunter, and he has not heard the last of it yet.

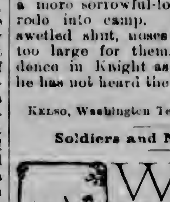
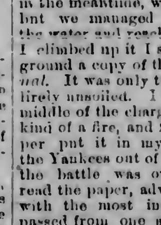
Soldiers and Newspapers.



"We have grown so accustomed to newspapers," said an old soldier, "that those of us living in cities fail to appreciate how necessary they are to our comfort and contentment of mind. Now, I was in the Confederate army, and during our long campaigns in the South we rarely heard from home. A newspaper—and we saw few of them—was as welcome as a square meal to a starving man. At the battle of Chickamauga a detachment of Federals were posted behind Lee & Gordon's mills, on the banks of the Chickamauga River, opposite us. Our division was ordered to charge them. We plunged into the water and started for the enemy. The Yankees, however, caught us in a shrewd trap. They cut down the dam just as we were in the middle of the stream, and a torrent of water came down upon us. It came up to our waists and nearly swept us off our feet. We had to hold our guns above our heads in order to keep them dry, and you know that wading through deep water is slow work. The enemy, in the meantime, were firing upon us, but we managed to plunge through the water and reach the bank. Just as I climbed up it I saw lying upon the ground a copy of the Louisville Journal. It was only two days old and entirely unsoiled. I stooped down in the middle of the charge, under the hottest kind of a fire, and folding up that paper put it in my pocket. We drove the Yankees out of the mills, and, after the battle was over, I sat down and read the paper, advertisements and all, with the most intense pleasure. It passed from one soldier to another, and they read it until it was so badly worn that the letters could no longer be deciphered.

What Else Would He Do?



When Major Polk arrived at his headquarters in Mexico he knew nothing whatever of military matters," said Gen. Viele, recently. "He was ordered to take command of the regiment of which I was Adjutant. Before doing so he got a friend to write out all the orders he would have to give. When he appeared upon the scene he called out to the Orderly to send the Adjutant to him. 'Here are my orders,' said Polk, handing them over to me. 'Have them published.' They were published accordingly.

"The next day Major Polk was ordered to form a squadron. He said to me: 'My spur is off; I wish to put it on. Give the order to put the squadron in motion.' I did so. 'Continue to give orders, sir!' shouted the Major. The next day he began to read up on military tactics. He read the first page and took a drink. Then he read the second page and took another drink. Finally he threw down the book and exclaimed:

"'Adjutant Viele, I don't know a d—— thing about it. My brother is President of the United States. You stick by me and tell me what to do, and I'll see that you get quick promotion!'

"I stuck to the brother of the President."

A True Story.

One of the best-known men in Nashville owes his life and success to his sweetheart. He was born and reared on one of the British Isles, the son of a prosperous banker. When nearly 21 he had a serious difficulty with his father and was bidden never to darken the door of his ancestral home. It was late at night when he left the house and wandered along a moor which bordered the family domain. He was prostrated with grief and remorse, and determined to take his life. He sat down and took his pistol out. As he reflected, he took a photograph of his sweetheart from an inner pocket of his coat and scanned the well-known features with eyes dimmed with tears. Thinking upon her, hope returned, and he determined to live for her sake, if not for his own. He hastily shoved the weapon into his pocket and started for the railway station. He came to America and drifted to Nashville. He prospered in business and is now a highly-respected citizen.

Unfortunately, the romance ends here. For years he had no communication with his family and the letters he wrote to his sweetheart miscarried, for shortly after he left her family moved to a distant town. He returned home a few years ago and sought out his early love. She was married, and three children played about her knees. He has consoled himself with a fair American, and considers himself one of the happiest of men. But he has never ceased to thank his stars for the girl who once saved his life. That her influence did prevent him from suicide he frankly stated to one familiar with his life.—Nashville American.

CARL DUNDER.

He Sighs for the Old German Customs.

[Detroit Free Press.]

"Sergeant," said Carl Dunder as he tip-toed into the station-house yesterday, "I pellef I like to go pack to Shermany again."

"What's the matter now?"

"Vhell, everything vhas too fast und too strange eafer here for some old man's like me. Dot Yankee vhas a queer feller—awful queer. Some man's come into my place eafery day und yell out:

"'Hi! dere! Two peers! Set 'em oop, quick! Ta! ta! Good-pye, Dunder!'

"Und he throws down der money, gulps down dot peer, und vhas off pefore I can say Shack Robinson. It doan' be like dot in Shermany. I goes mit a place at a shlow walk, und I puts in py der door und shpeaks mit eaferypody. I ask him aboudt his wife und shildren, his horse und cow und pig, his health und his garden, und by und by I sat down und say to dot bar-keeper:

"'Hans, maype you haf some peer?'

"'Yes, Herr Dunder.'

"'Maype it vhas goot peer?'

"'Yes, he vhas.'

"'Vhell, I try a glass.'

"He goes py der cellar and prings him oop, und I take a seat und play some sheckers, und I drink a leedle und wait, und drink some more und wait, und by und by it vhas swelve o'clock und I goes home to dinner."

"That's too slow, Mr. Dunder."

"Dot's der vhay all you Yankees say. How long you pelief I vhas getting married, Sergeant?"

"Oh, perhaps three weeks, and that's giving you seven days over the rest of us."

"Tree weeks! Vhy, it vhas ten y'ars, und dot vhas too soon! If I wait one more y'ar I doan' marry Mrs. Dunder at all! It vhas like dis: It takes von y'ar to be intreduced to dot girl. "Is that possible!"

"Dot vhas possible. In der oldt country wooden shoes vhas all right for me. In dis country Shake likes some fine gaiters, und he shines 'em oop mit placking. Shust tell him dot, Sergeant, and you may shently hint to him dot if he doan' do petter you pelief he vhill pe hung for murder. Good-pye, Sergeant—maype I vhas too oldt for dis country."

Historic Men of Memory.

The history of the world has been dotted along with the names of those who have possessed remarkable memories. As far back as the remote periods of antiquity, we are told there lived men who were famous for their wonderful powers of memory.

It is said by Themistocles, that he could call by their names the people of Athens, which city then numbered twenty thousand inhabitants.

George the Third, of England, though deficient in education, never forgot a name once heard or a face once seen.

A school teacher of London, whose name was Dawson, possessed a remarkable memory. He could repeat the Book of Job and the Psalms, and on a wager of two hundred pounds, he repeated, without the aid of a book, Spenser's "Faerie Queene," a poem of nearly four thousand stanzas of nine lines each!

Parsons, the Greek scholar, could repeat Milton's "Paradise Lost" backward.

A monk who resided in Moscow in the fifteenth century, could repeat the whole of the New Testament.

It has been written of the Bourbons that they never forget a man's name, nor his face, and this has been sometimes considered as a true sign of their royal nature.

Houdin was once invited with his son to a gentleman's house to give a private seance, and as they went up stairs they passed the library door, which was partially open. In that single moment young Charles Houdin read off the names of twelve volumes and recognized the positions of two busts.

The gentleman, during the seance, was artfully led by the father to ask some questions relating to the library, and was astonished by the accuracy of the magician's answers.

Boone, the blind negro pianist who has given performances through several States, has a most wonderful memory in connection with his art. From once hearing it, he was able to play Liszt's celebrated "Hungarian Rhapsody" without missing a note.

Blind Tom also performed similar feats.

Mozart, when only 13 years old, played a new opera from one hearing, which had been composed expressly to test his skill.

A writer, referring to this incident, says: "He not only reproduced the opera from memory—which was a difficult piece—without missing a single note, but on a second playing threw in variations in such a manner that all who heard him were speechless with astonishment."

McKensie tells us a most interesting story about Carolan, a blind Irish harper and composer, who once challenged a famous Italian violinist to a trial of skill.

The Italian played the fifth concerto of Vivaldi on his violin; then to the astonishment of all present, Carolan, who had never before heard the concerto, took his harp and played it through from beginning to end without missing a single note.—Will Lisenbee, in St. Louis Magazine.

The Personal Devil.

Do I believe in a personal devil, son?

Don't I? I don't know of any creature in the universe more given to personality than this same devil to whom you allude.

I believe in demoniacal possession. I myself have seen men possessed with devils exceeding fierce. I have seen a child which had a dumb spirit. Why I myself have been grievously vexed with a devil. Not once, my son, but many times; not only twenty-five years ago, but yesterday, possibly today; more than likely to-morrow.

Why, my boy, did you never get up in the morning with a demon of ill humor, of perversity, of hatefulness, in full possession of you? You feel strong, vigorous, well; your head doesn't ache; your vision is clear; your debts are paid; the day is bright, sunny, beautiful; nobody gives you a cross word; everybody in the dining-room speaks pleasantly to you as you come in, and the bitter, mean, waspish devil of perversity that has possession of you snarls out a hateful answer the minute you open your lips to speak; makes you say something you never intended to say; puts into your mouth words that make your own heart ache, as your eyes see the lips that you love quiver with pain at your harshness.

Have you never maintained a surly, mean, cruel humor, while a brave, loving face, looking up into your clouded brow, was cheerily trying to cast out the evil spirit? Have you never done some mean thing at which your better nature revolted? Never been ill-tempered all day when you had no cause, no reason for it, and were torturing yourself even as you tortured those whom you most dearly loved?

Ah, yes; you have writhed in the clutches of these devils of perversity, obstinacy, ill-humor, unreasoning and unreasonable moodiness, fiercely crying out against the love that would cast out the evil spirits.

But this, you say, is owing to physical and mental causes. The body is in ill-health, and there is in the human organism an integration and co-ordination of different vital actions, which—There; that will do; I always feel one coming into me when I hear you talk in that way. Physical health has nothing to do with it, because some of the greatest sufferers the world has ever known have been entirely free from this demoniac possession, while some of the meanest men I ever knew have lived in perfect health to their eightieth year. You know yourself that when you feel that way you are possessed of a devil.

Do I believe in him? My boy, it doesn't make a particle of difference whether a man with the "jumping toothache" believes in the toothache or not; he's got it; the toothache is in possession just the same. And, between you and me and the man named Legion, he acts for all the world as though he did believe in it.—Burdette, in Brooklyn Eagle.

South Sea Falsifiers.

To this day Samoan men and women, with few exceptions, wear the garments of their savage days—a cloth, generally of the native make, known as the kapa, wound round the body above the hips and falling about fifteen inches. They tattoo their legs and sometimes other parts of the body with some substance giving a sky-blue color. Their modern houses are built on the immemorial model of which every one who has read a book about the South Sea has seen a picture. Quite a large number of them add to their primitive style of dress an umbrella. Rain is very frequent in Samoa, but the chief use of the umbrella is as a shade from the sun. Lying so near the equator and surrounded by sea water which always keeps a temperature on the surface of about 80 degrees (Fahrenheit), the average heat is very high, though by no means equal to that experienced in tropical Africa or other continental regions in similar latitudes. It must be confessed that the costumes and habitations are very suitable to the climate, and that it would be an act of cruelty to impose on the Samoans any other style of life.

The civilization they chiefly need is the enforcement upon them of respect for the precepts of the decalogue. For lying and for petty thieving they have few equals in Christendom or heathendom. When family prayers are over at night their one idea is, if the moon be not too bright, to secure the household provisions for the next day from the bread-fruit and banana trees of some one else's land. The white man is their favorite victim. From him they will, with the utmost good humor, steal anything they can lay their hands on, even if it be not of the slightest use to them. In every store—even in the smallest shop—will be found a most careful system of barricades interposed between the native customers and the goods, while the watchful eye of the storekeeper is ever upon them so long as they haunt his premises. They scarcely ever come singly to buy anything. Having no settled occupation at any time, half a dozen of a family or a village will accompany to the store the fortunate one who has a dollar to buy something with. Hence the necessity for barricades and vigilance. As for the habit of lying, it may be said that a Samoan so seldom speaks the truth (when he thinks any object is to be gained by not doing so) that he is never believed on his own word. These two accomplishments of lying and stealing are taught to children by their mothers, who always find it necessary to have testimony at hand to deceive their husbands.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Shaving in China.

Everything is reversed in China, you know. Men don't go to a barber-shop to get shaved, the barber-shop comes to them. That is, the man of the razor carries his kit around hunting customers. No sitting in a crowded shop waiting for the cry of "Next." You have only to sit down on the curbstone when you want a shave and a barber comes along and attends to you immediately. He never talks to you, but you can talk him blind if you want to.—Texas Siftings.

PEASANTS OF CHAMPERY.

A Swiss Village Whose Young Men and Women Are Not Given to Marrying.

[London Queen.]

The peasants of Champery are especially genial and pleasant; every one you meet has a bonjour for you, and they never think of asking more than the value of their excellent cream and milk. They are not a marrying people, and there are very few children to be seen. In one of their possessions there were eighty-five unmarried women. Astonished at such a number of old maids in a small community, I inquired if the young men sought brides from a distance. The answer was: "Oh, no; they do not often marry at all. They live at home with their parents; there are not chalets enough for them to make a separate menage, nor land enough to feed more months." Therefore this village bids fair to decrease in population.

The Cure has an immense influence and does not allow his people to beg. He disapproves of gay colors. Hence the women's hats are mostly trimmed with black, and he has put quite a veto on dancing. When servants' balls are got up in the hotels he begs that the young men will not give their hands in the dance to the stranger. He does not think it necessary to caution the young women. A few days ago a young girl, said to be the prettiest in the village, died of consumption and was buried two days afterward. It was a pretty sight to see the funeral procession come down the village. The bearers were four young men with white ribbons and favors, and the women all wore white muslin veils—the same which they had worn on the fete of the Assumption of the Virgin, when all the people, men and women, attended service in the church, and with the Cure at their head, walked through the village, chanting and carrying a banner. The little church was full during the funeral service, the women kneeling to the left, the men to the right of the aisle, the coffin placed in the middle, covered with flowers and surrounded by lighted candles. At one period of the service the women all filed round in procession, each one sprinkling the coffin with holy water. After the coffin had been lowered the grave was filled in by the four young men, and the mound shaped by them, the poor girl's godmother remaining to superintend and put the finishing touches. The portrait of the girl adorns the shop windows, riding on a mule like a man, and with the primitive wide trousers which the women wear in the mountains. There are two or three general shops or "stores," where every variety of article can be purchased, from large hats and gauze veils to woolen goods and English biscuits.

As a rule ladies come to these mountain places quite unprovided with suitable attire. They have dresses with "kilting" round the bottom, which rip off and catch on a rock the first mountain path they descend, often risking a bad fall. Then they have boots so thin that the stones literally cut them to pieces, and they have to resort to the native shoemaker, who will make them a strong pair of high laced-up boots for about 14 francs. A plain woolen skirt, not gored, is the most useful dress. It should be not so tight as to impede progress, nor so heavy as to fatigue the wearer, and there will be nothing in it to catch or tear. A full flannel bodice and belt at the waist, to which latter a few useful articles should be attached (knife, scissors, pins, etc.), and a large hat, which will dispense with a sunshade, are also desirable, as it is uncomfortable to have to hold a parasol in one hand and pick your way with an alpenstock in the other.

Daniel Callaghan, the Great Irish Merchant.

One of the ablest and most accomplished merchants that Ireland ever produced was Daniel Callaghan. He set up, when but a stripling, in the butter trade, but was refused credit for £400 at Tonson & Warren's bank, as his first experience. He, however, finally obtained the aid he was in need of, and from that time pursued his business with great success.

A great London merchant took the whole provision contract at the time and the Cork merchants combined to engross the market. This was the moment chosen by Callaghan to reap the reward of the study he had bestowed so inquiringly and systematically upon the business of his choice. Alarmed at their position, one of the Londoners came over, and was still more dismayed when he reached Cork. Young Callaghan introduced himself, and what was then thought a most presuming thing on his part, he gave a dinner to the Londoner, to which, however, he had some difficulty in getting guests. He soon showed the London firm the game it should play, and to their enlightenment expounded all the resources at their command. A share of the contract was immediately given him, and before the year expired the same firm handed Callaghan £10,000 on his own word, after having hesitated only nine months before to take his bond for a few hundred.

There have been Irish merchants who realized greater fortunes than Callaghan, who was rated at considerably above a million sterling; but it was the splendid style in which he transacted his affairs; his off-hand dealing, his liberality and contempt for peddling, and his complete mercantile accomplishments, that placed him at the head of the Irish commercial world.

Thackeray and the American Girls.

There's something simple in the way these kind folks regard a man; they read our books as if we were Fielding, and so forth. The other night some men were talking of Dickens and Bulwer as if they were equal to Shakespeare, and I was pleased to find myself pleased at hearing them praised. The prettiest girl in Philadelphia, poor soul, has read Vanity Fair twelve times. I paid her a great big compliment yesterday, about her good looks of course, and she turned round delighted to her friend and said, "Ai most tallut"—that is something like the pronunciation. Beatrix has an adorable pronunciation, and uses little words which are much better than wit. And what do you think? One of the prettiest girls in Boston is to be put under my charge to go to a marriage at Washington next week. We are to travel together all the way alone—only, only I'm not going. Young people when they are engaged here, make tours alone; fancy what the British Mrs. Grundy would say at such an idea!

There was a young Quakeress at the lecture last night, listening about Fielding. Lord! Lord, how pretty she was! There are hundreds of such every-where, airy-looking little beings, with magnolia—no, not magnolia, what is that white flower you make bouquets of, camilla or camelia?—complexions, and lasting not much longer.—Scribner's Magazine.

NEWSPAPER SYNDICATES.

Origin of the Establishment of Bureaus for Supplying Cheap Literature.

Of late years it has been generally recognized that, owing to the rapid development of the daily press, local and general news only will not keep up the circulation of a weekly newspaper, and consequently each year sees a greater number of progressive journals moving with the times and usurping the position of the magazines, by inserting serial stories and the like. Notwithstanding the frequent announcements one sees in local newspapers, to the effect that Miss Braddon (say) is "especially writing for our columns" a new serial story, it must be evident to the majority of readers that scarcely any provincial weekly newspaper could afford to pay for the exclusive rights of newspaper publication of a novel by a popular writer.

Mr. Tillotson, of the firm of Messrs. Tillotson & Son, of Boston, was the first to suggest the plan of newspaper syndicates for the purpose of buying novels by popular authors. The first novel thus purchased was from the pen of Miss Braddon, and the price paid for it was £450. This was nearly twenty years ago, and we believe since then that most of Miss Braddon's novels have been first published in this way—of course, at very much higher prices. Messrs. Tillotson now publish seven or eight novels by well-known writers every year.

For the rights of publication of a story by Miss Braddon an ordinary weekly newspaper has now to pay £15, while for a story by Mr. Walter Besant £20 is asked from each newspaper. A novel from the pen of Mr. James Payn or Wilkie Collins can probably command nearly as much. In exceptional cases, where the newspaper rights are required for large districts, even more than this has to be paid. The lowest price we have seen quoted for a story is one shilling a column; but as this was from the pen of an unknown writer, and would probably appear in about twenty newspapers, even this rate for first publication compares favorably with the remuneration given to writers in boys' journals. In these papers five shillings per column is considered very good pay, and then it should be remembered that most of the stories written for boys are not published in volume form.

Readers of newspapers are great gainers by the syndicate system. To novelists, also, it is a great boon. Take the case of Mr. W. Clark Russell for example. According to an American newspaper, when he writes a novel, he sells the right of publication to some syndicate, the right of book production to one of the best English publishing firms, then he gets a large price for the serial rights in the United States. A Canada publisher buys the right to issue in book form, and in Australia the rights of both book and serial publication bring him in money.

Mr. James Payn gives an illustration of the syndicate system: "A novel," he says, "is published in serial form by a syndicate of eight or ten provincial newspapers, the issues of which * * * have an average circulation of fifteen thousand. The novel simultaneously appears in America and Australia. This gives at least three hundred thousand buyers, but it is calculated * * * that the readers of the popular novelist of to-day may literally be numbered by millions. Moreover, this does not include the readers of the various editions of the book itself, nor of its translations."

Other literary work—such as London letters, ladies' columns, articles on farming and the like—is also "distributed" by the syndicate system; and one lady in London, who writes a column weekly on fashions and subjects of interest to ladies, makes a very good income, owing to the fact that her article appears coincidently in goodness knows how many papers. Much of the London correspondence for provincial weekly newspapers is paid for at a very low rate—so low, indeed, that bricklaying is much more remunerative, unless writers are "in the swim" and have a good connection.

Syndicates are occasionally formed at war times for the purpose of sending a capable correspondent to the seat of operations, but this, of course, is only done in the case of daily newspapers which are not able to afford the great expense of sending a correspondent on their own account. During the campaign in Egypt some of the most brilliant and graphic sketches of the operations were sent to a syndicate formed under these circumstances.—London Exchange.

Preservation of Meats and Fruits.

The preservation of meats and fruits for use out of season and at remote points has assumed within the last few years great proportions. All sorts of plans and methods are employed. Many processes are so extremely simple that they can hardly be cheapened, while others consume so much time and labor that the use of chemicals is resorted to, and hence these come into wide distribution as foods. One of the most common of chemicals employed is salicylic acid. The physiological effects of this compound have been carefully observed, and so pronounced is its pernicious action on good health that its use has been prohibited in France since 1881. Prof. E. H. Bartley of the Long Island College Hospital has given this subject a thorough going over, and states his conclusions in a recent number of the American Analyst. It is a matter of clinical observation that salicylic acid when taken into the stomach impairs the digestive powers, and, as it is eliminated unchanged by the kidneys, irritates and inflames those organs. In fruits generally it is true that small amounts of the acid are used, but "the quantity of salicylic acid usually employed in wines is from six to eight grains per gallon, and in beer from twelve to fifteen grains per gallon, or, in the case of beer, from one to one and one-half grains per glass. As many men drink habitually twenty-five glasses during the day, they take from twenty-five to thirty-five grains of the acid per day." Mr. Bartley calls attention to the fact that nursing mothers frequently take ale, or beer, or porter, and at the same time are troubled with temporary kidney disease. Mr. Bartley concludes this interesting paper as follows: "I should state that another serious objection to the use of salicylic acid is the fact that many samples found in the market contain more or less carbolic acid. It is now almost entirely manufactured from this very poisonous substance, and unless great care is exercised, an appreciable amount of it is left in the finished product. Indeed, some writers think that some of the fatal accidents from the use of salicylic acid have been due to the presence in it of carbolic acid. If the use of this acid is to be counterbalanced, impure articles will be used, and greater damage may be done than could come from the pure article. From a careful consideration of the whole subject I am compelled to regard the use of salicylic acid in foods and drinks, and especially in lager beer, as at least open to serious objections. If it be harmless to healthy adults, the evidence of its deleterious action upon the aged and certain other classes of the community is too strong to be disregarded by sanitary authorities, and should prohibit its use for this purpose."

"Do It Gently."

Most of us don't see the acorn, and when we get old we grumble that we have no home in a tall oak tree. But it was our own fault; we buried something that the soil couldn't assimilate, and nothing came of it. It was sad enough in all faith. But it was also uncommonly stupid. There are thousands of chances in every man's life, and the clever men pounce upon them and turn them into substantial blessings. But the stupid men, however wise and learned they may be, don't see them, and leave them hanging behind the door, or tread them under foot, or frighten them away rudely. You must be very gentle with your chance. A clever fellow has at it without a moment's hesitation and secures it. But when he has it he handles it as tenderly as if it was a rare butterfly. There was once a young man who was really very gifted and had all manner of scientific inventions at his fingers' ends, and all he wanted was money and influence to push them. So some one got him an introduction to a great man, and every one said poor Malapert's fortune was made. But it wasn't. For the great man, though he had the heart of an eagle and the mind of a god, chose to live in softly carpeted chambers, and liked low voices and much courtesy. And Malapert behaved so indecorously, tramping about like an elephant and shouting like a sea dog in a storm, that the great man thought he was an impostor, and politely showed him out into the cold, and there he is still. He had his chance in his very hand, and he lost it through his want of tact. He is a wretched old man now, so poor that he eats, but never dines. Yet he might have set the Thames on fire if he had only been clever. And he might have been happy. For though genius and talent are often miserable and gloomy, cleverness is always happy, because it never blunders, never has anything to regret, never expects more than it gets. It is a sublime thing to be a genius and a fine thing to have gifts, but it is a blessed thing to be clever. For the clever man misses nothing, falls out with no one, enjoys life to the utmost, and, probably because he is successful, is also good.—London Society.

Society in India.

Society in Murree is like Indian society in general in all save the three principal cities. The military element very largely predominates and in custom much of the etiquette of the first Anglo-Indian communities is still retained. English people in India have not yet introduced weekly at-home days; but here, as in the plains, the strictly fashionable calling time is between twelve and two every day except Sunday—a relic, it is said, of the past, when our grandmothers and grandfathers considered four o'clock the state dinner hour. At twelve punctually, therefore, each day the firing of the gun which sets the true time for the station reminds people that they must be either starting to pay calls or preparing to receive them. Duly at that time ladies sally forth on their formal duties, regardless of the power of a full tropical sun and the probable chances, even in the hills, of an attack of sunstroke. Those who are of homely dispositions will ask their friends to come and see them in the afternoon; but that has its drawbacks, as tennis parties and other gayeties cause almost the whole station to be "not at home" after half-past four or five o'clock. The calling hours are, however, not the only alteration in home customs which a new comer has to observe, if she would escape social ostracism, for English etiquette is, in some respects, entirely reversed. The last arrival, for instance, has to call upon all the other visitors in the station, unless she happens to be a bride, and in that case, she calls nowhere until others have honored her. Other customs, again, of very recent introduction, such as the practice of every lady coming to an hotel making a formal call upon every other lady in the same hotel, are noteworthy, not only for their local peculiarity, but as typifying the extreme formalities of Anglo-Indian society.—London Queen.

One Hundred Glasses a Day.

"Beer wagon drivers eat less and drink more than any class of people living." The speaker was a big brewer and knew what he was talking about. "Yes," he continued, "the wagon drivers drink beer so frequently and so continuously that they are almost constantly in a drowsy condition. They drink mechanically, whether they want it or not, and I never knew one to refuse an invitation to have more. They seem to think it is their duty to swill all the beer they can put down. They get into the habit at the brewery. Every brewery has what is called a tap-room, which is nothing more nor less than a free bar. Beer is always on tap there, and the employes have free access to it, with the privilege of helping themselves whenever they please. Whenever a breweryman goes to the tap-room for beer he never drinks fewer than two glasses. These are turned off in the twinkling of an eye. The men drink so much that they lose their natural inclination to eat like other people. They seldom eat a hearty meal, a bite now and again between drinks being sufficient to appease the appetite. There are few brewerymen who drink less than 100 glasses of beer a day, and I know of some who never go to bed without taking in that number, and twenty-five more."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

Though reading and conversation may furnish us with many ideas of men and things, yet it is our own meditation must form our judgment.

Truth is as impossible to be soiled by any outward touch as a sunbeam.

A Pleasure Shared by Women Only.

Malherbe, the gifted French author, declared that of all things that man possesses, women alone take pleasure in being possessed. This seems generally true of the sweeter sex. Like the ivy plant, she longs for an object to cling to and love—to look to for protection. This being her prerogative, ought she not to be told that Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the physical salvation of her sex? It banishes those distressing maladies that make her life a burden, curing all painful irregularities, uterine disorders, inflammation and ulceration, prolapsus and kindred weaknesses. As a nervine, it cures nervous exhaustion, prostration, debility, relieves mental anxiety and hypochondria, and promotes refreshing sleep.

Astor's "Secret Pain."

John Jacob Astor was compelled at one time to repair to Paris, where he could avail himself for a physical infirmity of the assistance of the renowned surgeon Baron Dupuytren. The latter thoroughly restored him and advised him to ride out every day. He frequently accompanied his patient during these rides. One day while they were out together Astor appeared quite indisposed to talk. Not a word could be got out of him, and at length Dupuytren declared that Astor must be suffering from some secret pain or trouble. He pressed him and worried him until finally the millionaire loosed his tongue:

"Look ye, Baron! how frightful this is. I have here in the hands of my banker at Paris about 2,000,000 francs and cannot manage, without great effort, to get more than 2½ per cent. per annum on it. Now this morning I received a letter from my son in New York informing me that there the best acceptances are at 1½ to 2 per cent. a month. Is it not enough to enrage a man?"

"What Drug Will Scour These English Hence?"

Wicked Macbeth, who murdered good King Duncan, asked this question in his despair. Thousands of victims of disease are daily asking "What will scour the impurities from my blood and bring me health?" Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will do it. When the purple life-tide is sluggish, causing drowsiness, headache, and loss of appetite, use this wonderful vitalizer, which never fails. It forces the liver into perfect action, drives out superfluous bile, brings the glow of health to the cheek, and the natural sparkle to the eye. All druggists.

To Denver in One Night.

On December 4, 1887, the Burlington Route, C., B. & Q. R. R., inaugurated a fast train service as follows: Fast express train known as "The Burlington's Number One" leaves Union Depot, corner Canal and Adams streets, Chicago, at 12:01 p. m. daily and runs to Denver solid, arriving at 10 p. m. the next day, thus making the run from Chicago to Denver in thirty-four hours. This train arrives at Omaha at 5 a. m., making the run to Omaha in seventeen hours. Corresponding fast train from Denver to Chicago. Direct connection made to and from St. Louis with these trains, and at Denver with the fast train of the D. & R. G. R. R. for San Francisco and Pacific coast points. Superb equipment on "The Burlington's Number One," consisting of sleeping cars and coaches from Chicago to Omaha and Chicago to Denver without change. Cheap Farming Lands South.

It is a recognized fact that the cheapest farming lands in America to-day are in the South, and men of much or moderate means, looking for real estate investments, or permanent homes, should not fail to visit the following points, where so many Northern people are now settling, viz: Jackson, Tennessee; Aberdeen and Jackson, Mississippi; Hammond, Crowley, Jennings, Welsh and Lake Charles, Louisiana. Round Trip Tourist tickets, limited to June 1st, 1888, with stop-over privileges south of Cairo, Illinois, are on sale to New Orleans, Jennings and Lake Charles. For rates apply to nearest ticket agent, and be sure your tickets read via the Illinois Central Railroad from Chicago or St. Louis. For pamphlet entitled "Southern Home Seeker's Guide," and circulars concerning the above named points, address the undersigned, at Manchester, Iowa.

A Popular Thoroughfare.

The Wisconsin Central Line, although a comparatively new factor in the railroad systems of the Northwest, has acquired an enviable popularity. Through careful attention to details, its service is as near perfection as might be looked for. The train attendants seem to regard their trusts as individual property and as a result the public is served par-excellence. The road now runs solid through fast trains between Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul and Minneapolis with Pullman's best and unequalled dining cars; it also runs through, solid sleepers between Chicago, Ashland, Duluth and the famous mining regions of Northern Wisconsin and Michigan.

Itching Piles.

Symptoms—Moisture; intense itching and stinging; most at night; worse by scratching. If allowed to continue tumors form, which often bleed and ulcerate, becoming very sore. Swayne's Ointment stops the itching and bleeding, heals ulceration, and in many cases removes the tumors. It is equally efficacious in curing all Skin Diseases. Dr. Swayne & Son, Proprietors, Philadelphia. Swayne's Ointment can be obtained of druggists, or by mail.

Catarrh Cured.

A clergyman, after years of suffering from that loathsome disease, Catarrh, and vainly trying every known remedy, at last found a prescription which completely cured and saved him from death. Any sufferer from this dreadful disease sending a self-addressed stamped envelope to Prof. J. A. Lawrence, 212 East Ninth street, New York, will receive the recipe free of charge.

Consumption Surely Cured.

CHARLEVOIX, DEC. 28, 1887.

New York Graphic: Mr. Mills says: "Perfect free trade is an impossible." It is, a perfect impossibility.

Early in the year President Cleveland did the vetoing, but Mr. Blaine just now seems to be leading in that line of business.

Chattanoga Journal: If the duty was taken off of raw material, would the immense iron deposits of East Tennessee ever be developed?

A good many sons of veterans will cast their first vote for President in 1888, and they will not cast them for the man who appointed Lamar to the supreme bench.

The Boston Journal calls attention to the fact that in 1883 the States which had elections gave a net Democratic majority of 5,261. This year they gave 103,074 the other way.

Nashville American: But a free trade policy for the Democratic party will retire enough Democrats, keep them from the polls, to endanger Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, and Louisiana. We write this because we can see the danger and would gladly avert it.

Secretary Lamar has issued an order directing that all lands heretofore withdrawn and held for indemnity purposes under grants to a large number of railroads, including the G. R. & I., be restored to the public domain and offered to settlement and entry under the general laws, after giving the usual notice.

Detroit Tribune: The counties of Barry, Branch and Hillsdale have surprised the most sanguine friends of the local option law by their enormous majorities for prohibition under that act. What public measure enacted by a Michigan legislature has ever met a more cordial reception than has this from the people who have pronounced upon it. We know of none.

It looks like war in Europe this time sure. First Russia moves a regiment of soldiers; then Austria, hearing of it, sends more troops to the frontier; then Russia, in self-defense, moves more soldiers to the frontier; then Germany, in view of the alarming preparations of its neighbors, gets its military ready to mobilize at a moment's notice. It takes a high fence to keep big dogs from fighting once in a while, even when there are no bones to pick. Better not have so many soldiers, and then nobody would be scared.

After confirming Lamar as a justice of the Supreme Court, why not put Jeff Davis on the pension roll? Why deny one and reward the other for doing precisely the same thing? Both were origional secessionists, both conspired to destroy the government, both are wedded to the same doctrines. Lamar says no man shall call Jeff Davis a traitor in his presence, add Jeff Davis speaks of Lamar as the best living representative of the old South. Neither of them has ever admitted that the South was wrong, but, on the contrary, both maintain that her cause was right. Why not serve both alike? Lamar in a speech on the floor of the Senate said: "Jefferson Davis stands in precisely the position that I stand in. * * * The only difference between myself and Jefferson Davis is that his exalted character, his pre-eminent talents, his well established reputation as a statesman, as a patriot and as a soldier, enabled him to take the lead in a cause to which I consecrated myself. * * * His name will continue to be so honored for his participation in that great movement."

A prominent Michigan man who attended the recent Convention of Republican Clubs, has been interviewed. Regarding Blaine's popularity he said: "You know the voting in the convention was done by clubs—a majority of the clubs gave the club vote. Well, when the secretary called the roll, just as soon as he came to the name of the Blaine Club the convention just got up and yelled, as the Chicago convention did when he was nominated. Those who had gone to the convention lukewarm for Blaine speedily became convinced that he is the real leader of the Republicans, and the only one for whom there is real enthusiasm." When asked what figure the temperance question would cut in the party hereafter, the gentleman replied: "The saloon has gone from Republican politics. The saloon keepers have been given warning that they have no more to expect from the Republicans. There are some good men among them, too—men who are better than their business. But the line has been drawn, and hereafter the Republican party will be found arrayed against the saloons."

The dedication of the Bellaire M. E. church will take place Christmas day. Services Sunday morning, conducted by Presiding Elder Sherman, and Rev. D. O. Ball, of Petoskey. Evening service, conducted by Rev. G. S. Robinson, of East Jordan.

While a log was being sawed thro' in a northern Michigan lumber camp, the saw cut in two a large moccasin snake that was encased in the heart of the wood. As there was no opening in either end of the log, the mystery is, how did the snake get there.

Never since the days of '49 has there been an an outbreak of the California fever which would compare in virulence with that which has raged in many of the Northern and Eastern States this winter. The real estate boom has done what was accomplished by the discovery of gold. Wide awake advertising has done the work, and it will do the same for Northern Michigan if our people will only go about it.

The state military board are in communication with the railroad and navigation companies regarding rates for the militia to Mackinaw island next summer. They have received assurances that the lowest possible rates will be given, although no figures are yet obtainable. Col. Farnsworth, now in Washington, will confer with Senators Palmer and Stockbridge relative to securing a grant of 160 or 200 acres of land on the island from the government, the site to be used for a permanent camp ground for the State troops.

A movement made in Cadillac to deliver $35,000 worth of railroad bonds into the hands of a committee of trustees for sale at a discount has failed, the common council refusing to act, as requested by Supt. Ashley, of the Toledo, Ann Arbor & Cadillac road and sixty local business men. It was the purpose to use the proceeds for payment of debts owed by the company, which have caused business uneasiness and depression at Cadillac. Mr Ashley proposes to effect his design in some other way as soon as possible.

A St. Ignace dispatch says: A terrible tale of suffering is reported from Lake Nippising. John Benoit, returning to his home in a canoe, was caught in the ice, but with an axe managed to make fair progress until the tool slipped from his hands into the lake. Realizing that he would freeze to death if he remained, he endeavored to make his way over the thin ice to the shore. It broke with him, and he was obliged to swim. He had almost reached the shore when his strength gave out. His wife, who witnessed his frantic struggles, crawled out on the ice and pulled him out of the water, but could not carry him, and he died before assistance could reach him.

Petoskey Record: The joke played on Jake Passage last fall by Sam Pettengill played itself out before U. S. Attorney G. Chase Goodwin on Tuesday morning. Mr. Passage is a practical joker, whose reputation as such is one of the established things of Northern Michigan. One day last fall he went into the store of Pettingill Bros., and Sam, who had been carrying for some time a most atrocious silver dollar, worked it off on Jake in giving him change. Next day Passage came around, and after Sam had tried to exacerbate [what?] his feelings by laughing at him, told him if he would set up the cigars he would give him a good dollar. Contrary to all expectations, however, Jake took the matter to heart, and made a complaint against Pettingill before Assistant U. S. Commissioner Clay E. Call for passing counterfeit money. The matter rested there during the absence of Passage, until Tuesday morning, when Pettingill was summoned to appear before Goodwin, who had come up from Grand Rapids on purpose. After hearing Mr. Passage and his witnesses, Mr. Pettingill made a statement of the facts, and Attorney Goodwin dismissed the case at once, there being no grounds of action under the the circumstances. The fellows who have suffered from Jake's practical jokes [and the editor of the SENTINEL is one of them,] are chuckling over the conclusion of the matter not a little, and the expression "Now Jake knows how it is himself," indicates the situation.

The outcome will be watched with considerable interest.——A very romantic marriage took place before Justice Parnum recently. The contracting parties being Daniel Ludington, of Kegomic, this county, and Miss Martha J. E. Keier. The romantic part of the story is this: Some weeks ago Mr. Ludington noticed in a newspaper an item to the effect that a lady, representing herself to be young, handsome, and of an amiable disposition, desired to correspond with single gentleman with a view to matrimony. Mr. Ludington answered the notice, a few letters were exchanged between the parties, and last Saturday the lady herself arrived in person, with the above result. THE "SOO" BOOM.

The Railroad Systems Which Make Sault Ste. Marie Interesting.

Practically all that is lacking for the connection of the American northwestern railway system with the eastern portion of the Canadian Pacific is the paltry bridge over St. Mary's canal. That will be completed this week and then, commercially speaking, Liverpool and Japan will be 1,000 miles nearer each other than they are to-day. The Duluth, South Shore & Atlantic road and the international bridge over St. Mary's river form the link which joins the Northern Pacific with the newly completed Canadian line and secures another transcontinental railway system. Its termini are the two Portlands. One is in Maine, the other in Orgeon.

That portion of the Duluth, South Shore & Atlantic road which has been under construction of late, and though practically completed, still lacks a gap of some twenty-two miles of unrailed road bed, 165 miles long. It extends from Nestoria, forty-six miles west from Marquette, to the Northern Pacific junction, which is at a place called Iron River. Mr. J. A. Latcha, the chief engineer, is now on the ground, and, barring unexpected accidents and unforeseen delays, he will have driven the last spike synchronously with the completion of the St. Mary's canal drawbridge. The Sault extension was finished some time ago and, together with the round-houses, shop and other terminal necessities, is now in working order, as is also the older extension from the main line up into the copper country with its termini at Hancock and Houghton. The new road also has good connection with the Wisconsin Central near Ashland via Nestoria and Lake Gogebic. The completion of this railway will not only supply the connection eastward for the Northern Pacific, but will also give the shortest and quickest transportation to Montreal, Portland and even Boston and New York for the freight and passenger traffic of all roads concentering at Duluth. It will further afford connection with the New York Central and Pennsylvania systems by transfer facilities at Mackinac City, as will be shown below. Mr. James McMillan of Detroit, is president of the Duluth, South Shore & Atlantic road.

Another line, which has afforded some amusement for railway men in its race for the "Soo" with the Duluth, South Shore & Atlantic, is the Minneapolis, Sault Ste. Marie & Atlantic road, which seeks more rapid communication with the Atlantic seaboard by connection with the Canadian system. The rival reached the "Soo" first, but the Minneapolis line, as it is briefly called, has completed its road some days in advance of the South Shore line, the first train having already made the trip from Minneapolis.

It is these three roads which have built the great international bridge over St. Mary's river. The structure cost $1,000,000. The bridge company raised the cash by the sale of 5 per cent. bonds, guaranteed by the interested roads—the Canadian Pacific, the Duluth South Shore & Atlantic and the Minneapolis, Sault Ste. Marie & Atlantic. It is 2,420 feet long. The superstructure of iron rests upon ten stone piers. This is the main bridge. Its complements are three additional bridges over canals at each end and spanning the north channel. Adding the length of these spans to the main bridge, the total linear measurement amounts to 3,144 feet.

But the Pennsylvania and New York Central systems have not been blind to these energetic developments. The former, which includes the Grand Rapids & Indiana road in its system, and the New York Central, which controls the Michigan Central, have been busy at work preparing to make rapid and convenient connection with a branch of this system, which runs from Sage to St. Ignace. Both the Grand Rapids & Indiana and Michigan Central have terminal facilities at Mackinaw City, which is across the straits from St. Ignace. By the time the system is in operation the new transfer boat, the St. Ignace, now approaching completion at Detroit, will be ready to carry trains across the straits of Mackinac.

What is actually saved by the new route in distance is palpable. England is brought 1,000 miles nearer to Japan, as stated above, that is, over the old route via New York and San Francisco. The distance from Duluth to the seaboard, either via Montreal, the New York Central or Pennsylvania system is lessened about 300 miles. Or more specifically the distance from Duluth to Boston is decreased about 275 miles and to New York 150 miles. The Minneapolis road secures proportionate contraction in distances, and about the same end is reached for St. Paul and Minneapolis by a connection of the Duluth, South Shore & Atlantic with the Omaha road at Mason, near Ashland, Wis. These new connection are the occasion of far-reaching interest among railroad men the country over, and also to such Europeans as are financial or otherwise concerned in trans-American shipment.

By the statement that these new roads and the international bridge will be completed this week, it is not meant that the extensive traffic promised for the system will at once be opened. A considerable part of the work has been accomplished during the frosty weather. The action of cold is to hummock the roadway. The work of ballasting, however, will be brought to as great a perfection as the element permit, but it will not be until the congealed earth yields to the warmth of early spring that the solidification necessary for regular traffic use can be secured.

A TRIP SOUTH.

What L. E. Allen Observes "Away Down South in Dixie."

[Mrs L. E. Allen hands us the following extracts from a letter from Mr. Allen, dated Jacksonville, Fla., December 19th:]

* * * No snow south of Grand Rapids, but the ground white with frost at Cincinnati. No cold weather south of there only when the wind is from the north, and then it is disagreeably cold. I have seen no good farming soil south of the Ohio river, except about 50 miles, with Lexington, Ky., in the center. There is some of the finest country I ever saw; the climate ought to be fine. They probably will have from six to twelve inches of snow through January and February. The whole distance is generally settled, but there is no thrift except in the cities, where the Northern people have gathered.

The soil is too poor for timber or anything else, in comparison with our country. No real timber anywhere until you get into southeastern Georgia, where there there are millions of acres of pitch pine turpentine plantations, but these woods you can drive a load of hay through, and the timber looks like our Norway pine, but not one tree in a hundred large enough for logs.

Lexington and Georgetown are the only places of importance between Cincinnati and Chattanoga. I did not get quite to Chattanoga. Then comes Atlanta, which is a very fine town—all really built since the war, and principally with northern capital. Population about 10,000.

Then comes Macon, with 20,000 inhabitants, but of a more southern type. Then Jacksonville, 30,000, with a very few fine blocks, and no fine residences. But you know they have oranges and no cold weather, which makes up for all other things lacking—and they do lack everything else. The train I came in on had six sleepers, two private sleepers, and six coaches, but I do not think there were 20 people stopped over here. I thing that Cincinnati, Chattanoga, Atlanta and Jacksonville are the commercial centers of the whole section.

There is no life except in the cities. There is so much Yankee element here in Florida that it is on a paper baloon boom, and that is all there is of it. The orange boom is exploded. But they do taste good, and 4 for 5 cents is cheap, but the potatoes are poor enough to make it up. I saw a very fine flower, similar to a large rose, this evening, in a garden. Orange trees loaded with fruit in all of the yards. I shall go down and see the Charlevoix bushwhackers Thursday I think.

—A Detroit lake captain, in a recent interview, predicts a lively season for shipping next year. Among other reasons he gives this: "I am inclined to think, too, that the low stage of water next season will be an important factor in lake business. I think that some of the larger sized crafts will have to count on carrying from 200 to 400 tons less per trip on this account, in order to be able to get over the shoal spots. I have watched this matter pretty closely, and I have noticed that the water has been gradually lowering for eight years past, and there is no indication of a return rise. Experienced marine men will tell you that the water gradually falls for eight years and then begins to gradually rise again. If the rule holds good the rise ought to begin this coming spring, but if it did it would hardly be sufficient to make any appreciable difference."

LICENSE WINS IN BOSTON.

A Temperance Defeat in the Hub—O'Brien Re-elected Mayor.

THE vote polled in the municipal election in Boston aggregated 51,487, which is larger than any municipal vote since 1883. Of this number O'Brien (Dem.) received 26,621, and Hart (Rep. and Ind.) 24,866, the labor vote failing to materialize. There have been several changes in the making of the Board of Aldermen, the new Board standing 8 Republicans and 4 Democrats, being a gain of two members by the Republicans. The Common Council will stand 43 Democrats and 29 Republicans, the same as last year. The city voted for license by over 8,000 majority.

MOB VIOLENCE.

Two Negroes Tortured and Lynched at Dade City, Florida, by Infuriated Whites.

A SPECIAL from Dade City, Florida, says Dick Hines and Charley Metz, colored, were lynched there Tuesday for assaulting Mrs. Oberry and her daughter, living near Owensboro. When arrested the negroes confessed their crime and begged for mercy, but were speedily lynched. No particulars can be learned save that they were tortured before being strung up, and the ropes were so arranged that they slowly died of strangulation. Their bodies were left hanging, and it is reported they were afterward riddled with shot.

CROWN PRINCE WORSE.

A New Growth Discovered in the Patient's Throat.

A SAN REMO dispatch says: "The doctors in examining the Crown Prince discovered symptoms of a fresh growth and an increase in the swelling. A special consultation of medical experts was determined upon. Dr. Mackenzie will attend at the request of the Crown Prince." A London dispatch says that Dr. Mackenzie has started for San Remo, where he will make another examination of the Crown Prince's throat.

What Gen. Manley Says.

IN an interview at New York, Postmaster Manley, of Augusta, Maine, an intimate friend of Mr. Blaine, is reported as saying: "I have no question but Mr. Blaine will be nominated at Chicago, and by acclamation, because Republicans in every section of the land regard his nomination as the strongest one that can be made. Of course I do not know what Mr. Blaine will do, but I believe he is too much of a patriot and too good a Republican, whatever his private wishes and desires may be, to decline such a call made upon him."

Drowned in the Missouri.

WHILE crossing the Missouri River, twenty miles below Bismarck, Dak., a family consisting of Charles Whalen, wife, and daughter were drowned. They lost the road, and the team passed so near a large air-hole that the ice broke. The bodies have not been found, and it is not likely that they will be, as they have been carried under the ice.

THE committee report on the West Virginia contested election case was unanimously adopted by the Senate on the 14th inst., and the oath of office was administered to Mr. Faulkner. Mr. Morrill addressed the Senate at some length on his bill relating to foreign immigration, the principal object of which, he explained, was to have the character of the immigrants examined by the United States Consul at the port of departure. He stated that nearly one-third of the population of the country was composed of foreigners, and expressed a doubt as to the possibility of transforming them into good American citizens. Among the bills introduced in the Senate were the following: By Mr. George, to protect innocent purchasers of patented articles; by Senator George, to annex the public-land strip south of Indian Territory to the Territory of New Mexico; also, a bill to appropriate $100,000 for the erection of a public building at Vicksburg, Miss. Senator Butler introduced with slight amendments the bill reported from the Committee on Improvement of the Mississippi River last session, and known as the Cowdon outlet bill. It is entitled "A bill to make the Lake Borgne outlet, to improve the low-water navigation of the Mississippi River from New Orleans to Cairo, and incidentally to reclaim and protect the valley lands of the Mississippi from overflow without levees." The House was not in session.

EAST.

A PITTSBURGH telegram says that President Smith, of the Flint-glass Workers' Association, has ordered a general strike of the tableware workmen. The strike is against the rules and scale adopted by the manufacturers. The strike affects 1,400 men and causes a suspension of work in nineteen factories.

A NEW YORK special says: "Reports received at the Metal Exchange regarding the work of the fire in the famous Calumet and Hecla copper mines were of a most discouraging nature. According to these reports the fire has so extended as to destroy the supports in the main shaft, and the walls and about an acre of the mine have caved in. Fire and flames are now bursting up from all parts of the mine, and all hope of saving the property is now said to be given up. A new shaft, from 3,200 to 3,600 feet in depth, will now be required to put the ruin in working order, and this will be a process requiring two or three years."

HENRY S. IVES, the brilliant but erratic financier, has been arrested in New York on a charge of converting to his own use a draft for $100,000 which came into his possession as trustee for the Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton Railroad. His bail, which was fixed at $25,000, was furnished by his sister.

D. DECASTRO & Co., of New York, shipping and commission merchants, failed for about $1,000,000, three-fourths of which is due in South and Central America. The assets are heavy.

WEST.

JOHN ARENSDORF, whose two trials at Sioux City, Iowa, for the murder of Rev. Mr. Haddock have excited wide-spread interest, has been acquitted on the second trial.

THE farm residence of Michael Harris, fourteen miles from Wessington, Dak., was destroyed by fire, and Mrs. Harris and six children were burned to death. Mr. Harris and one daughter escaped.

THE death is reported from Whatcom, Washington Territory, of the Rev. I. S. Kalloch, who has long been a prominent figure on the Pacific coast. He was elected Mayor of San Francisco on the workingmen's ticket in 1879. During the campaign he was shot by Charles DeYoung, at that time editor of the Chronicle, the dispute growing out of a number of personal attacks made by both parties. A few months later Kalloch's son went to the Chronicle office and shot DeYoung dead, and was afterward acquitted of the charge of murder. At the close of his term of office as Mayor, Kalloch moved to Washington Territory, where he had since resided.

THE jury in the Harper case at Cincinnati found the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment, and he was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. A Cincinnati telegram thus describes the closing scene of the trial:

Judge Sage asked if the defendant had anything to say before sentence was pronounced upon him. Mr. Blackburn arose and announced that the defendant wished to speak through him and to say that he had nothing to add to what had been said, except to thank the court for its fair and impartial treatment, and to ask that the court be as merciful as the circumstances and the law would permit. The court directed Harper to stand up. It was a most distressing scene. The strong man stood erect, with tears coursing down his cheeks, but no other sign of emotion save his blanched face. Behind his chair, with bowed head, sat his wife, in an agony that had no better manifestation than the wringing of her hands. Tears did not come to her relief. Miss Mathews, far more demonstrative, still suppressed sobs, and in her own distress reached over to try to comfort her sister with a touch. So they sat, while the court, with impressive solemnity, recited the usual form of sentence, saying that the evidence left no doubt of the defendant's guilt and that the offense merited the highest penalty of the law, which the Court would impose—ten years in the Ohio Penitentiary with the order that the Marshal convey him thither at once. Still no outcry. Mr. Harper sat down. Turning to his wife, their lips met, her hands were around his neck, his arms encompassed her. The silence in the court-room was awful. Jurors wept, women and men all over the court-room were in tears. The silence was broken by Mr. Blackburn making a last request from the Court. That was that the order for immediate imprisonment be suspended, and gave as a reason that there was much business to be attended to by Mr. Harper, in which his wife was closely concerned, and it would be exceedingly difficult to attend to it unless Mr. Harper could remain here for a few days. But the court was relentless. Judge Sage said there would be an opportunity for his wife to see him in Columbus, and he repeated the order to the Marshal to convey him thither.

A CHICAGO dispatch says: "The building at the northwest corner of Adams street and Fifth avenue, which was owned by Edwin H. Sheldon, and occupied by Phelps, Dodge & Palmer, wholesale boot and shoe dealers, was completely ruined by fire Monday night. The loss on the building is placed at $115,000; insurance, $85,000. Phelps, Dodge & Palmer estimate their loss at $600,000, and say that it is about covered by the insurance. Adjacent property was damaged to the extent of $5,000.

SOUTH.

A PASSENGER train on the St. Louis, Arkansas, and Texas Railroad was stopped about midday between Texarkana and Hope by three train robbers and the express car rifled of its valuables. A Texarkana dispatch gives the following particulars of the affair:

H. J. Johnson, the postal clerk on duty at the time, says that as the train was moving out of Geneva Station he saw three rough-looking men board the engine and he knew something was wrong, so he blew out the lights in his compartment and locked the doors. The express messenger did the same thing. The three robbers were armed with Winchester rifles and pistols. They ordered the doors opened, and fired several shots through the windows. They then used a pickax, and Johnson fired one shot through the window, which was answered by a volley. The express messenger opened his doors, when a light was struck and a search by the robbers was begun. Johnson doesn't know accurately, but thinks the robbers must have got $10,000. The leader was much agitated. The conductor opened the door and was fired on. There was a panic among the passengers, who seemed paralyzed with fear. Great excitement prevails in the region of the robbery. After the robbery officers were soon on the ground, and two of them had a running fight with the robbers for about a mile and a half. One robber lost his hat and cartridge-box. Another was wounded, as shown by blood along the trail. The men were all mounted. The officers were pursuing them with bloodhounds, and are scouring the country in every direction.

CRUSE RODERIQUEZ was hanged at Uvalde, Texas, for the murder of Pancho Garcia. He protested his innocence on the trap. Roderiquez had been a brave soldier in several Mexican revolutions, and was highly esteemed by his commanders. He asked that he might be shot by a file of men, saying that he had always been a soldier, and wanted to die a soldier's death. To the last he refused to wear the black cap, and was hanged without it.

THREE children who were locked up at home by their parents near Point Pleasant, W. Va., were burned to death in the house, which was entirely destroyed by fire. This is the third case of the kind that has happened in that vicinity within a year.

A COURAGEOUS young woman of Cabell County, West Virginia, shot a negro burglar, who had effected an entrance into her father's house, as he was trying to make his escape through a window. The shot was fired at random, but fortunately it penetrated the fellow's brain.

WASHINGTON.

FROM Secretary Whitney's annual report we glean that—

Appropriations for the Navy Department for the last fiscal year amounted to $13,180,000, and the balance available at the end of that period was $634,800, which had been reduced by Dec. 1 to $164,500. The appropriations for the current fiscal year amount to $26,182,000, and the estimates for the year ending June 30, 1889, to $23,427,000. All the unarmored vessels authorized by Congress are completed or in course of construction. They and the contract cost of their hulls and machinery are: The dispatch vessel Dolphin, $315,000; the protected cruiser Boston, $619,000; the protected cruiser Atlanta, $617,000; the protected cruiser Chicago, $889,000; the protected cruiser Charleston, $1,017,000; the protected cruiser Baltimore, $1,325,000; gunboat No. 1 (cruiser), $455,000; gunboat No. 2 (cruiser), $247,000; the protected cruiser Newark, $1,248,000; protected cruiser No. 4, $1,350,000; protected cruiser No. 5, $1,428,000; gunboat No. 3 (cruiser), $490,000; gunboat No. 4 (cruiser), $490,000; dynamite cruiser (including dynamite guns, etc.), $350,000; first-class torpedo boat, $82,750. Of the two armored vessels authorized by Congress one is now being built by William John in England. The completion of the double-turreted monitors will be delayed until the Bethlehem plant can furnish the armor. Of coast and harbor defense, for which Congress appropriated $2,000,000, the Secretary says little has been done. The Secretary does not believe in repairing the single-turreted monitors and using them for coast defense. "An examination of their characteristics," he says, "shows that outside of the ships in our own navy no antagonist could probably be found against which they could stand for a moment. They were good vessels for their time, but are entirely obsolete," and he adds: "It would be little less than murder to send men in these at the present time to encounter any recently built ironclad. I appreciate fully that it is only as a temporary expedient that it is suggested, and with the thought that in the absence of anything else, these might be better than nothing. This has been the theory upon which over $50,000,000 has been spent since the close of the war. It is time to stop it and be content only with the best. If every dollar is made to count upon something of real value, waste will stop, and not before." The rest of the report is devoted to a detailed description of the condition and situation of the several vessels belonging to our navy, to the receipts and expenditures of the department (a balance of $16,592.25 on hand and available on Dec. 1), to estimates and appropriations for next year (over $2,000,000 less than for the current year), to sales made of naval vessels, to developments made in speed of vessels throughout the world, and to reports of the Admiral and the several bureaus of the department.

THE recent trouble with the Anarchists in Chicago and the prosecution of John Most in New York, says a Washington telegram, has suggested the preparation of a bill, which will be introduced in the House of Representatives by the Hon. George E. Adams of Chicago, providing for the expulsion of dangerous aliens from the territory of the United States.

POLITICS.

THE next Republican National Convention will be held in Chicago, June 19 next. This decision was reached by the National Committee in Washington last week. The final vote by which the result was reached was as follows: Chicago, 25; Omaha, 1; Cincinnati, 13; Minneapolis, 8. A Washington dispatch says:

Every conceivable argument against Chicago was used. Combinations were attempted, but through the superior skill and adroit management of Chicago's representatives, every one of whom worked with earnestness, the others were driven from the field, and that city was triumphant. The Cincinnati and Minneapolis people worked the hardest. Philadelphia did not make much of a struggle after all. Those who supported her, or many of them at least, really favored Chicago, and their fight was a feint to obtain more liberal promises in regard to hotel and headquarters facilities and rates than might otherwise have been obtained. There are people who assert that this is really the secret to the whole business. They say that if Chicago had been allowed to run away with the convention without a show of a fight the hotels there would have been at liberty to make any charges they pleased, while now they are bound not to increase their regular rates.

THE London correspondent of the New York World, whose relations with Mr. Blaine are confidential, and who always speaks by the card when he talks of that gentleman, telegraphs to his paper the interesting information that, since the message of President Cleveland, Mr. Blaine has decided to become a candidate for the Presidency.

HENRY GEORGE has definitely decided not to be a candidate for the Presidency next year, and not to put the Labor party into the campaign. In an interview at New York he declared that he was not in favor of going into a national campaign for a number of causes, but particularly because of the expense of a national campaign. He is in favor of any party which will declare in favor of free trade.

FOREIGN.

IT is semi-officially announced that the reports in the Austrian and German papers regarding the movements of Russian troops are inexact, says a cable dispatch. Since the Czar's return from Copenhagen no order has been given for the reinforcement of the troops on the Galician frontier. The recent movements of troops were made in compliance with orders issued over a year ago, including the transfer of the Orenburg division of cavalry, which was recently effected.

THE formation of the Tirard Ministry was brought about by the threat of M. Carnot to resign if M. Tirard refused to go ahead with the task. It is now called "Carnot's cabinet." The organ of M. Clemenceau and other radical organs make violent attacks on the new Government, which it is expected will collapse after the holidays. President Carnot in his message to the Chambers says: "The Government desires to give consideration to measures affecting labor, public hygiene, and national thrift, and it especially wishes to study how to improve the financial condition, to effect an equilibrium between revenue and expenditure, and to simplify the administrative and judicial systems. The government is also desirous to give a large share of attention to the land and sea forces. It is for the Chambers," continues the message, "to endow the government with power to execute this programme, which will secure for the country a lasting era of peaceful and fruitful activity, and thus give Europe a pledge of the ardent desire of France to strengthen the general peace and assist in the development of good relations between the Powers." The message was well received.

GENERAL.

A NEW YORK telegram says that application was made to Judge Lawrence in the Supreme Court for the admission to bail of Johann Most, in whose case an appeal has been taken from the judgment of the Court of General Sessions. The application was granted, and Most was released on $5,000 bail. Mrs. Hoffman became his surety.

SOME astounding disclosures have been made at Montreal in connection with the arrest of John Fahey, Chief of the Dominion Detective Agency, an ex-detective named Naegele, and Constable Bureau, late of the Grand Trunk force. The specific charge against them is the robbing of the safe at Bonaventure Station, and it appears that they had planned several big operations of a similar nature. It is said that the criminal practices of Fahey and Naegele reach back through a period of ten years or more.

THE so-called national party among the Cherokees which has been left out in the cold by the Downing men has appealed to the United States Government. A Commissioner will be sent from Washington to investigate and adjust the dispute over the recent election.

PASTIMES.

The St. Louis Club's Crack Pitcher Will Play in Brooklyn Next Season.

Chicago's New and Wealthy Toboggan Club—Other Mention.

[CHICAGO CORRESPONDENCE.]

Robert Carruthers, the famous pitcher of the Browns, has returned to Chicago from St. Louis, but at last accounts had yet not signed a contract to pitch for Brooklyn next season. When asked by a Chicago reporter, however, which club he would probably play with next season he said:

"I think with Brooklyn."

"Would you rather go there than to Cincinnati?"

"No. My preference is Cincinnati, but Von der Ahe will not release me to Cincinnati."

"How do you know?"

"He told me so. He said that he would refuse any offer Cincinnati might make, and that $20,000 would be no inducement."

"Then you will go to Brooklyn?"

"Yes. I think I will sign there within the next three days. I would have signed in St. Louis had it not been for my mother's strenuous objections, and I, of course, could not disregard her wishes."

"Why does she object to your going to Brooklyn?"

"I guess she thinks the company down there is a little too fast for my health. You know I am far from strong," said Bob, with a grin.

"Von der Ahe won't have much of a team left, will he?"

"Oh, yes. He showed me a list of the men that he expected would make up his regular team next year. They are King, Hudson, Knouff and Devlin as pitchers; Milligan and Boyle, catchers; Comiskey, Nicholson and Latham on bases; Robinson at short, O'Neil, Munn and Holliday in the outfield. Then he has two or three good new men."

"What show will St. Louis have next season?"

"Not the walk-over we had this year. If I could go down to Cincinnati I think Mullane, Smith and myself could do our share toward making the rest of them hustle to keep up with Cincinnati. But I guess I won't be there. If Byrne sticks to the $5,000, Von der Ahe sticks to his expressed determination not to let me play in Cincinnati, and my mother gives her consent to my going East, I will put my name to a Brooklyn contract before many hours."

A question of growing importance among professional base-ball clubs is that of securing good and capable umpires. It is being demonstrated more and more every year that the smooth progress of a game depends more upon the manner in which an umpire renders his decisions and enforces the rules than upon any one else connected with the game. Several base-ball men were discussing this question the other day in Spalding's Chicago store, and among them was Harry Palmer, the Chicago base-ball writer. "The position of an umpire," said Palmer, "in a championship game between clubs of such reputation and importance as that enjoyed by those of either of the big organizations is without doubt the most important to be filled upon a ball field. A competent man can handle almost any class or grade of players in such manner as will insure the smooth progress of the game, while an incompetent, rattle-headed, or unscrupulous man can create chaos, disorder, and disgraceful quarrels at will.

"One thing that makes me hot," continued Palmer, "is the failure of club managers to back up and sustain the action of umpires in demanding respect from players and enforcing the rules upon the field. I believe that there was many a fine imposed last year which was never collected or heard from afterward. A player who receives a high salary and plays an important position may get the big head, for instance, and once he attains that degree of mental deformity it is safe to bet that he never loses an opportunity to bluster and bully and make a spectacle of himself for the benefit of the grand stand—and, I may add for the information of these fellows—much to the disgust of the grand stand. 'Me?' he will say to the umpire; 'Me? Jess wait till de game is over, cull, an' I'll settle wid you.' Now, if I was an umpire, I would fine a man so fast and heavy that he would shut up and crawl back to his position with mighty little of his bluster left if he gave me any such talk as that. More than that, I would tell the club management that if they did not sustain me in my action they could have my resignation, and after that I would lose no time after the game in hunting up my man and giving him all the chance he wanted to 'settle wid me.' I am in favor of giving the umpire absolute control upon a ball-field. Let there be no appeal from their decisions by any man on either side—captain, or any one else. Make it compulsory for the umpire to fine a man not less than $10 nor more than $25 for questioning a decision, and put it out of the power of the club to remit that fine, save where it can be proved beyond all doubt that it had been unjustly administered. Of course, any player would have the right to appeal and the right to demand investigation, after the game was finished, but under no circumstances should he be permitted to open his lips in protest of a decision while a game is in progress."

The firm of A. G. Spalding & Bros. last week gave the largest order for bicycles ever given by any house in America. Their order was for 1,500 Victor bicycles, valued at $195,000.

Chicago is to have the wealthiest and toniest toboggan club in this country or Canada. A party of millionaires have just organized the "Onaway Toboggan Club," and will erect a magnificent private club slide near the north end of Lincoln Park. The slide will be the finest ever built in America, and will be 1,500 feet long, with handsome club-houses, lookout-houses, and waiting-rooms adjoining. Three hundred members will be admitted. The club costumes will be especially rich in design and color, and the famous "Star" toboggan will be used.

NEWS NOTES AND COMMENT.

Charles Snyder, the veteran catcher of the Cincinnati Club, but now with the Clevelands, has returned to his home in Washington to spend the winter. He looks the picture of health.

Umpire Phil Powers has written a letter to President Young declining to officiate as a League umpire next season. Powers states that he is pleasantly situated in London, Ontario, and that he will manage an International League Club there. He also states that he could not umpire for the League any way next season, except at increased salary. He closes by wishing that the League staff may be made of good men, who will do all in their power to promote the national game.

After a prolonged struggle of many weeks' duration, Thomas J. Esterbrook again appears in the base-ball arena with renewed vigor. Practically he has been in retirement for a season, and many teams have been figuring with him. A telegram from New York announces that this prince of eccentricity has signed to go with Indianapolis, and another source of worriment to base-ball officials is ended.

It is understood that President Soden, of Boston, has written to a friend and agent, asking him to receive from the Cincinnati Club a figure upon Elmer Smith's release. It is further understood that the epistle stated that Soden stood ready to pay $12,000 for the privilege of buying the great left-hander. The bean-eaters believe that Smith is the coming pitcher, and would like very much to see him in a Boston uniform.

DEATH SETS ITS SEAL.

One of New York's Best Known Women Passes Away.

A New York dispatch announces the death, after a long illness, of Mrs. John Jacob Astor, in the 62d year of her age. The dead woman was the wife of John Jacob Astor, the chief owner and heir of the great Astor estate, which is estimated at $150,000,000. Mrs. Astor, who was a Miss Gibbs, was remarkable for her intellectual attainments and for a conscientious fidelity to duty. Mrs. Astor was a very generous hostess, caring more for intellect and character than for mere fashionable position, although she had a proper sense of the dignity of her station. She always entertained the distinguished visitors to New York (as the President and his wife, the foreign Ministers, and the English and French aristocracy). She was a very good linguist and musician, played the piano like a master and spoke and wrote French, German and Italian. She was a delicate little woman with a very high-bred carriage and wore her splendid diamonds as if she were the daughter of a hundred Earls. She was devoted to good works and was fond of going to read to the patients in the Woman's Hospital. She was remarkable for her choice of language, being somewhat scholarly, and had the old-fashioned manners of the old school. She was an admirable custodian of a large fortune and an eminently religious, good woman. The only noticeable extravagance in her habits was the purchase of diamonds. She had a passion for the precious stones, in which she had invested to the extent of $800,000.

THE NATIONAL CAPITAL.

Senator Cullom is Satisfied with the Interstate Commerce Law.

But He Will Introduce Some Amendments to Make It Clear—Other News.

[Washington telegram.]

Senator Cullom says that he intends to introduce a bill at the first opportunity amending the interstate commerce law in some important particulars. I asked him what he thought about the report of the commission.

"I have read it carefully," he replied, "and in the main its findings are sound. I think the commission has shown itself to be more capable than the public anticipated it would be when it was first organized. The decisions of the Commissioners have been about as near right as the decisions of courts ordinarily are, and I am satisfied that they are more in the interest of the people than they would be if the question involved in them had been decided by ordinary judicial tribunals, for the reason that the Commissioners are not restricted by rules of evidence from getting at the truth."

"Then you are satisfied with the results of the law as far as it has gone?"

"Yes, the value of the Commission has been demonstrated beyond controversy, as well as the importance of the law, and its defects are not so great as I anticipated. It was merely an experiment, but, though I am an interested observer, I judge that it has been generally satisfactory. I knew it was not a perfect bill, and had a great many misgivings when it passed, but it has run easier and been much more effective than I anticipated, which, it is only fair to say, was largely due to the industry of the Commission and the common-sense application of its provisions. It has not proved oppressive, but has been as beneficial to the railway companies as to the public."

REGULATING IMMIGRATION.

There seems to be a very strong sentiment in favor of restricting immigration, and half a dozen or more bills have been introduced into the Senate for that purpose, nearly all of them being in the line as that proposed by Senator Palmer. Among others was one from Mr. Farwell, of Illinois, which provides that every immigrant coming to the United States, before he is allowed to land, shall produce a certificate of good character from the United States Consul of the district from which he comes, as evidence to show that he is capable of self-support. It looks very much as if some such bill would become a law at this session, and it is certain to be passed by the Senate, although it will meet with greater opposition in the House.

MR. FARWELL'S BANK BILL.

Mr. Farwell has introduced a bill, which has already been published and widely commented on, authorizing national banks to deposit railway, State and municipal bonds instead of United States bonds to secure their circulation. Speaking of this bill and the criticism upon it, Mr. Farwell said that he believed it proposed the only "method by which the country can have a circulating medium after the payment of the public debt, and that the safeguards thrown around the bill are unquestionably sufficient, because the committee to pass upon the bonds furnished as a security for circulation will consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer of the United States and the Comptroller of the Currency."

Mr. Farwell has also introduced a bill to remove the tax on oleomargarine and to require the manufacturers of that article to place upon every package a label showing its character.

Mr. Farwell introduced another bill to repeal the tax upon domestic and the duty upon imported tobacco; also to repeal the duty on sugar and give a bounty of 1-5 to 2-5 cents per pound on cane and beet sugar manufactured in the United States.

Another bill introduced by Mr. Farwell provides for the recalling and recoining of the standard silver dollar into a coin containing 441 grains. The holders of silver bullion may have it coined on the same terms that gold bullion is now coined.

TO DISTRIBUTE THE SURPLUS.

Senator Aldrich, of Rhode Island, has introduced a very important financial measure, which is the result of several conferences between the Secretary of the Treasury and himself. This bill is intended to distribute the surplus in the Treasury, and gives the Secretary absolute authority to expend the surplus, both by the purchase of United States bonds at market rates and by the anticipation of interest on bonds at any time. With such authority as this the Secretary of the Treasury would be able to relieve any stringency in the financial market by opening the doors of the cash-room.

EUGENE HIGGINS WILL GO.

Mr. Eugene Higgins, chief of the appointment division, says that the report that he will shortly retire from the public service is true. He will shortly tender his resignation to Secretary Fairchild, but has not as yet fixed upon the exact date. He wanted it distinctly understood, however, that his retirement was entirely voluntary, and was in no way due to the efforts of people who have shown so much dissatisfaction at his retention in office.

The principal reason for the proposed step, Mr. Higgins said, was his desire to better his condition in life by going into business for himself. While not desiring to pose as a martyr, it was a fact that he retained his present office at a personal sacrifice much longer than he intended. Another reason why he had not resigned before was that he was being assailed on all sides, and he could not bring himself to retreat under fire.

All the statements made by Mr. Higgins as to the voluntary nature of his retirement are confirmed by those officials who are in a position to know, and it was added that the Secretary is entirely satisfied with his management of the appointment division, and has never had cause to regret his appointment.

Oakes is the Vice President and General Manager of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, Buckley is the Assistant General Manager of the same company, Bonner is a timber agent for it and President of the Montana Improvement Company, Hammond is a timber agent of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and General Manager of the Montana Improvement Company, and Hathaway is Assistant General Manager of the Montana Improvement Company.

CONGRESSIONAL.

Work of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

IN the House of Representatives, on the 9th inst., the Speaker announced the Committee on Mileage as follows: Rogers (Ark.), Belden (N. Y.), Howard (Ind.), Burnett (Mass.), and Felton (Cal.). Various resolutions to amend the rules were introduced and referred to the Committee on Rules, when it shall be appointed. The House then adjourned until Monday, the 12th. After the reading of the journal and the presentation of a few department communications, the Senate, on motion of Mr. Farwell, adjourned till the 12th.

MANY bills were introduced in the Senate on the 12th inst. and referred, among them the following: By Mr. Beck, for the retirement of United States legal tender and national bank notes of small denomination, and the issue of coin certificates in lieu of gold and silver certificates. By Mr. Dolph, to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses. By Mr. Edmunds, to provide for the establishment of a postal telegraph. By Mr. Bowen, for the free coinage of silver. By Mr. Manderson, granting a pension to every soldier and sailor who is incapacitated for the performance of manual labor and for pensions to dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors. [He said he introduced this bill at the unanimous request of the Grand Army of the Republic.] Also for the admission of the State of Dakota and the organization of the Territory of Lincoln. By Mr. Cullom—For a pension to the widow of Gen. John A. Logan; also for a constitutional amendment in relation to bigamy and polygamy. By Mr. Blair—For a constitutional amendment extending the right of suffrage; also for the relief of women enrolled as army nurses. By Mr. Turpie—For the admission of the States of Washington and Dakota. By Mr. Hoar—For the erection of a monument to the negro soldiers killed in the war. By Senator Plumb—To make it an offense punishable by fine and imprisonment for any railroad, sleeping car, telegraph, or express company to offer any Congressman or other Government employe any free pass or reduction from the ordinary rates charged, or for any government employe to accept or use such a pass. Mr. Hale offered a preamble and resolution providing for the appointment of a select committee of seven to examine fully into the present condition of the civil service in all its branches; to ascertain whether appointments have been based on merit and qualifications or distributed as partisan favors, and as to the participation of government officials in political conventions and elections. In the House of Representatives, Speaker Carlisle, having called Mr. Crisp (Ga.) to the chair, stepped down upon the floor and addressed the House as follows: "It is well known that there is a contest pending which makes it improper for me, as presiding officer of the House, to appoint the Committee on Elections. I have left the chair, therefore, for the purpose of asking the House to excuse me from the performance of that duty and take such proceedings in this matter as its judgment may dictate. I have no suggestion to make except to say that the formation of the committees of the House will be facilitated by having this matter disposed of at the earliest day that will suit the convenience of members." On motion of Mr. Holman, a resolution was adopted providing for the election of the fifteen members of the committee.

THE Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections investigated the West Virginia contested-election case, on the 13th inst., and decided unanimously to report in favor of Mr. Faulkner's claim to the vacant seat. Mr. Ingalls introduced bills to remove the limitation in the payment of arrears of pensions and granting arrears in certain cases to those pensioned by special acts of Congress. Mr. Cullom introduced a bill to equalize the rate of pensions. It fixes the pension for loss of sight or disability requiring regular medical attendance at $72 per month. Mr. Cullom also introduced a bill to establish the United States postal telegraph, and another to define and extend the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Senator Jones, of Arkansas, introduced a bill to open the great Sioux reservation in Nebraska to settlement. Senator Dawes introduced a bill taxing manufacturers and dealers in adulterated lard, and requiring it to be stamped. The Senate Committee on Agriculture will give a hearing on this subject in January. The Finance Committee made a favorable report on the Merrill bill to refund to the States the direct taxes imposed by the act of 1861. The aggregate is about $15,000,000. The bill was placed on the calendar. The Senate voted to continue Senator Cockrell's select committee to inquire into the executive departments, with leave to report at any time prior to Jan. 25. Senator Chandler introduced a bill to regulate the holding of Congressional elections in South Carolina, Florida, Mississippi, and Louisiana. The House unanimously adopted a resolution offered by Mr. Cannon (Ill.) declaring that the following named gentlemen should constitute the Committee on Elections: Messrs. Crisp (Chairman), O'Ferrall, Outhwaite, Barry, Maish, Heard, Johnson (N. C.), O'Neill (Ind.), Moore, Rowell, Houk, Cooper, Lyman, Johnson (Ind.), and Lodge. Speaker Carlisle then directed that all papers in the various contested election cases be referred to this committee.

A Blockade-Running Story.

"It is not generally known that much of the blockade running and introduction of contraband stores and medicine during the war was done through the actual connivance of the Federal executive," said Mr. Randolph Tucker recently. He was the center of a little circle of friends who had been in sympathy with the lost cause.

"I will give you an incident in proof of this," he went on. "Beverly Tucker, my brother, was in New York as the purchasing agent of the Confederacy. He had come hither under the belief that an arrangement had been agreed upon by Secretary Stanton and J. A. Seddons, Secretary of War of the Confederacy, by which certain quantities of cotton were to be permitted to run the blockade out, and that a ship loaded in New York with bacon, flour, and quinine was to be permitted to run through the blockade into Charleston.

"Something led my brother to doubt the good faith of this alleged convention, and he wrote to me to go to Secretary Seddons, learn the exact particulars, and if the enterprise was safe to let him know. Mr. Seddons assured me that the compact had been made and would be carried out in good faith. Beverly had neglected to advise me how to communicate with him and I was in a quandary. I bethought myself, however, that a personal in the Herald could be made the vehicle. Seddons was known to his friends by the familiar nickname 'Sawney,' and I was generally called 'Ranny' for short. So I had friends insert this personal: 'Sawney says it is all right. Go ahead—Ranny.' Beverly saw the advertisement, completed the cargo, dispatched the steamer, and by means of certain prearranged signals she ran the blockaders without risk and delivered her most welcome stores."—New York Telegram.

Lay of the Minstrel.

Sad was the song the minstrel sung, in the light of the waning moon, and his voice was cracked and his knees were sprung, and his eyes far out of their socket hung, and he howled a dirge in a foreign tongue, and his lyre was out of tune. I softly unchained the brindle dog, and loaded the old shotgun; while he scraped his lyre in the damp and fog, and sung of a fairy who drove a frog, and held a court in a somber bog, by the light of a midnight sun. "No fairies for me," I softly said, "so singer, you'll change your tune; you must sing a ballad of death instead, of ghosts in purple and ghosts in red, of regions where wander the phantom dead, and there are no stars or moon." He tuned his harp to a dismal lay, that chilled all the blood I owned, and he sung: "There is a land in the far away, where never is gleaming the light of the day, where the goblins damp and the specters stay, and the wind with their shrieks is toned. The ghost of the pallid dude is there, bereft of its gilded cane; it has no oil for its yellow hair, it has no glasses to eye the fair, and it can not stand on the street and stare, so the dude is bowed in pain. The dude is chained to a sad-eyed ghost that used to be wild for gore, that followed the teaching of Spies and Most, and tried the law and the courts to roast, and was later strung to a towering post, and clamored for blood no more."

SETH C MOFFATT DEAD.

The Eleventh District Congressman Passes to His Eternal Rest.

The papers of last Monday contained the announcement that Hon. Seth C. Moffatt, of Traverse City, was seriously ill at Washington, from the effect of a malignant carbuncle under his chin. The following day the reports were to the effect that blood poisoning and other complications had followed, and that he was unable to recognize his friends.

Thursday morning the telegraph brought the sad news of Mr. Moffatt's death, and that a Congressional delegation had left Washington for Traverse City with the remains. The Traverse City Business Men's Association immediately met and appointed committees to arrange for paying appropriate honors to the distinguished dead. Upon the receipt of the news the deepest sorrow pervaded the entire community.

The writer of this article knew Mr. Moffatt twenty years ago, when he was a young lawyer at Northport, he having located there in 1866, after graduating from the Michigan University law department. He was not then considered to be over-ambitious of distinction in his profession or in politics, but was known as a brainy young man, equal to emergencies, and the soul of honor.

In the spring of 1874 he removed to Traverse City to accept the appointment of Register of the U. S. Land Office, which position he filled for four years, when the office was removed to Reed City. He was soon after elected to the State Senate from this district, and was returned a second term. In 1882 he was elected to the lower House of the Legislature, and was made Speaker. While in the House the re-apportionment of Congressional Districts occurred, and in 1884 he was elected to succeed Jay A. Hubbell as Representative from the new Eleventh District, embracing the entire upper peninsula, and the counties of Grand Traverse, Lelanau and Benzie in the lower peninsula.

He made a good record in Congress, and was re-elected in 1886. His majorities were the largest received by any Congressional candidate in Michigan in either canvas. His record at Washington has been that of an industrious and conscientious public servant, always alert to the interests of his vast district, and wielding a strong influence in the councils of his party.

No man in Northern Michigan was more widely known or universally respected than Seth C. Moffatt, and at his home his popularity was unbounded, his political support knowing no party limits. His friends throughout the State were legion, and their trust in him was deep and unchangeable. During a visit to Traverse City some years ago, the writer asked Hon. Perry Hannah for his opinion concerning a new phase of a political question. He answered: "I don't know until I have asked Seth." Although the reply was intended to be jocular, it illustrated the degree of confidence that was placed in his judgment. To his intimate associates he was fidus Achates.

As a lawyer, he was the farthest possible remove from a shyster. Mr. Hannah relates that when men came to him with law-cases of questionable justice, he would hoist his feet to the table, unfold a newspaper, and tell them to "go to Mr. ——— with the case."

Mr. Moffatt was one of Michigan's brightest men, and one in whom there was no guile. To the vast region which had intrusted its interests to his care the loss sustained in his death will be great, but no greater than that which is sustained by the party, of the doctrines of which he was an able and uncompromising exponent.

It will be no easy task for his successor to fill the Congressional seat as satisfactorily as did Seth C. Moffatt, and the place which he occupied in the hearts of his friends in Northern Michigan cannot be filled.

He leaves this life with an interrupted career of growing usefulness before him, and a record behind in which there is no spot or blemish.

—We presume everybody hereabouts had a Merry Christmas, and now we wish you all a very Happy New Year.

—Capt. Harrison Berdan and B. W. Miller have purchased 25 acres of cedar timber of S. S. Wakefield, and will get out ties, posts and shingle material.

Captain John Freer.

Capt. Freer and his "co-conspirators," appeared for trial in Chicago one day last week in the McGarigle case. The Inter Ocean say: "The last to arrive was Captain John Freer, the master of the schooner George A. Marsh. The jolly skipper bore under his arm a map of the upper ends of Lakes Michigan and Huron. He was attired in a suit of blue flannel, his short, stubby goatee hiding from view his collarless neck. State's Attorney Longenecker and Assistant State's Attorney Jampolis arrived just a moment before Captain Freer made his advent to the court-room. He was undisturbed in his general demeanor. His face, sun-tanned and ruddy, did not display the most remote apprehension as to his fate. He sat for the most part with his chair tipped over against the edge of the reporters' table, and his right leg thrown across the arm of his chair. He listened attentively to the examinations. As one after the other of the jurors, with visions of a departed Christmas at home dangling before their eyes, gave evasive and unsatisfactory answers, and endeavored to demonstrate total unfitness for duty, the Captain would make jocular remarks and nudge Dr. St. John in the ribs.

A reporter for the Inter-Ocean caught Captain Freer just as he was leaving the building and piloted him to safe retreat, where the commander of the Marsh told the following story: "E. T. Stewart is the city marshal of St. Ignace, and from what I heard before I left the court-room he is to be put on the witness-stand to testify against me. He claims that a day before McGarigle boarded my schooner—and I makes no bones about that fact—I was lying at St. Ignace. That is true. He claims that he (Stewart) got aboard of the Marsh. That's true, too, and then he is to go on and s wear that he held a conversation with me in the course of which he asked me why I did not proceed on my trip, and that I answered saying that I was awaiting the arrival of the Canuck Blake; that McGarigle was aboard and that I was waiting for her so as to transfer him onto my schooner. That's as false as it is ridiculous. Stewart did come aboard the Marsh and and I invited him below to the cabin. He went down with me and I got out the medicine chest, out of which I got a bottle of whiskey, and gave him four or five drinks. The latter circumstance I understand he has denied under oath. If so, I have a number of witnesses to the act, and shall convict him of perjury." Capt. Freer is one of the best known skippers trading here.

Later—Capt. Freer is acquitted.

HELLO! HELLO!

The Charlevoix Telephone Exchange and Outlying Connections.

No better evidence exists of the wide awake and enterprising character of the citizens of Charlevoix than the extent of the Charlevoix Telephone Exchange, and the extensive patronage given the local lines which connect the villages of the Pine Lake region.

At the central office in Dr. Crouter's drug store sits Miss Mary Scroggie, the efficient operator. Before her is the "switch board" and apparatus which connects into one system of communication the 26 phones which constitute the local exchange, with its 12 miles of wire, besides the 22 villages and 206 miles of wire.

The local exchange is made up of the following subscribers: Stockman & Iddings, Newman House, Chicago Resort, Fountain City House, Smithson's Camp, Dr. Carlstein, Rifenburg Milling Co., A. J. Mudge, W. U. Telegraph Co., Village Hall, Belvidere House, J. L. Hurd & Co., Charlevoix Savings Bank, W. A. Smith, Emrey Bros., A. J. McLeod, Bank of Charlevoix, Litney & Steimel, Dixon farm, A. E. Mason, Charlevoix Manufacturing Co., Barns & Stevens, F. J. Meech, A. Buttars, Smithson residence, Bridge Street House.

Charlevoix is in talking connection with Petoskey, Harbor Springs, Cross Village, Norwood, Atwood, Eastport, Torch Lake, Elk Rapids, Acme, Traverse City, Sutton's Bay, Old Mission, Williamsburg, Ironton, East Jordan, South Arm, Dwights, Boyne City, Boyne Falls and Horton's Bay.

All these points are so connected that with the band playing upon the street in front of the central office here, or a musical rehearsal at a private residence, connection may be made whereby the music may be heard at every point and at every phone in the local exchange, and the whistle of a steamboat may be distinctly heard 60 miles away.

The north side is connected by a cable of seven wires running on the bottom of the river, costing $1,000. This cable is now fully taken by circuits, and the company talk of putting in another next year, which will considerably increase the number of phones in the exchange.

Superintendent Watson regards Charlevoix as one of the best exchanges in his district. Petoskey, with double the population, has two less phones than we have, while Traverse City has less than double our number.

The records of the central office show an average of 75 connections or "talks" per day during the past year. During the summer months Miss Scroggie has to leave her knitting work at home, and is compelled to give mighty short answers to the nice young gentlemen who call. But she is prompt and accommodating with all patrons. Dr. Crouter is Manager, but during his absence George Wilhas charge of the office.

What would the residents of Charlevoix fifteen years ago have thought of a man crazy enough to predict this thing of Charlevoix within the number of years which have elapsed? Imagine the astonishment of Uncle Philo Beers could he return to his old haunts and witness the wonders which science has wrought in a region where in his day communication these distances meant many days of patient waiting or weary travel!

Mr. Shores and family were living at Smithson's Camp, and the house was occupied by Joseph Shores and the widow Wagner and their families, whose household effects were nearly all destroyed. The fire caught in the roof, around the stovepipe.

—We told a lie in our last issue. This is a rare occurrence with us, but we did. The latest village ordinance does not compel the cleaning of sidewalks on the back streets and avenues only Bridge street. Come to think of it, we made another misstatement, to the effect that the weather was pleasant. It was a colossal lie. Before the edition was printed, a blizzard—one of the kind that gets right down to business and makes Rome howl—forced itself upon our attention, and remained with us several days. As we write, snow-shovels are about the only things that are active.

The Festival of St. John.

Tuesday last was an eventful day in the history of the Masonic fraternity. The 27th of December and the 24th of June in each year are remembered because the two Sts. John were considered eminent Christian patrons of Masonry, and are generally observed throughout the world, more fully perhaps on the latter date. The observance of this date is by festivals and general rejoicing.

St. John the Evangelist was the beloved disciple, brother of St. James the Great. He was the youngest of the twelve apostles, and to his charge was committed the mother of Jesus at the foot of the cross. It is supposed that he remained in Judea as long as she lived, and then preached in various parts of the world. He was banished to the Isle of Patmos by Domitian, where he wrote the book of Revelation. After Domitian's death he returned to Ephesus, where he wrote his Gospel. He died at the age of one hundred years.

The Festival was celebrated by Charlevoix Lodge by a public installation at their hall, followed by a banquet, which was participated in by 120 people—Masons and their families.

Hon. E. H. Green, the first Worshipful Master, made a brief address on the history of the Lodge, and the evening was spent in social intercourse.

All who were present unite in the opinion that it was the greatest event in the history of the Lodge.

The Temperance Question.

In an interview recently, Senator Palmer expresses himself as follows on the temperance question: "I am a republican first, last and all the time, and for that very reason I am anxious that the republican party should keep pace with public sentiment on the liquor question, and for that very reason I talked as I did at the conference of the republicans at the Michigan Club, and still more emphatically to the New York Tribune."

"It was current here that you predicted that the republican party would declare for prohibition and make the fight for that issue."

"That the republican party will destroy the saloon is not a prophecy, it is merely an observation. Read the history of that party and note the character of its personnel. Its strength lies in the homes, the school houses and the churches of the land. The saloon is the enemy of all three. The party's purpose is the elevation and happiness of the citizen; the saloon is in politics and is to stay until destroyed. That can be seen with the eyes and heard with the ears. It needs no proof. It arrogantly confronts the republican party—just now somewhat weak by the defection of free trade Mugwumps and misguided third party temperance men—and challenges it to combat. Is there anything in the history of the republican party to warrant a doubt as to what answer it will return?"

"How and where do you expect the opening skirmish to begin?"

"Unless you refer to local and state struggles, I should say where the National battle against slavery was sought to be first formed, in the District of Columbia. If the drink problem can be solved by law in that district, it will be accepted as a full solution without further trouble. I think a bill to abolish the traffic in the district will be urged upon Congress at this session. It has been already introduced in the Senate by Mr. Pratt, and you may make a note that it was not introduced for buncombe nor for fun."

Historical Society.

The holiday meeting of the society was held in the pleasant parlors of W. P. Brown, last Friday evening. The following special programme was presented: Prof. H. M. Enos read the paper, having for his subject, "The Three Edwards;" Mrs. Downs and Miss Phila Wood gave recitations. An instrumental solo by Miss Maggie Green and vocal solos by Messrs. W. A. Smith and Dr. J. A. Carlstein. The next meeting will be held at the residence of Prof. H. M. Enos, Friday evening, Jan. 13th.

THE CHARLEVOIX SENTINEL.

WILLARD A. SMITH, Publisher.

CHARLEVOIX, MICHIGAN.

THEY WERE!

Were her eyes gray or blue?
I dare not say
How could I judge of their soft, lucent ray?
I only know she looked at me the way
That angels look
When mortals pray.

Was her voice proud or kind?
I do not know
It whispered to me as I turned to go,
And stole into my heart's recesses so
I thought it sweet,
And soft, and low.

Was her hair gold or brown?
I cannot tell.
Its clustered glory wrought on me a spell.
While dainty eyes beneath her lashes fell
In tenderness
I know full well.

Were her feet small—or large?
'Sh—whisper low
She owned a pair of number nines, you know,
Broad at the heel and spreading at the toe;
Don't mention it—
I loved her so.

DEATH PENALTIES.

Painful and Brutal Modes of Capital Punishment.

ANCIENT AND MODERN METHODS.

Execution by the Pope, Guillotine, Stake, Wheel, and Gallows.

Capital punishment for some one or more of the offences against society or the individual has been in vogue from the earlier days of the human race down to the present time. It is called capital punishment, or the punishment by death because the head, which is the most vital part of the human frame, is generally the part acted upon. The Latin word caput means the head, the source or seat of life. Capitalis, in that language, means anything affecting life.

CAPITAL OFFENSES IN THE MOSAIC CODE.

The principal offenses for which death was decreed by the Mosaic code were three: Murder, kidnapping, eating leavened bread during the Passover, suffering an unruly ox to be at liberty if he kill, witchcraft, beastiality, idolatry, oppression of the widow and fatherless, compounding holy ointment, or putting it on any stranger, violation of the Sabbath, striking a parent, eating the flesh of the sacrifice of peace offerings with uncleanness, eating the fat of offered beasts, eating blood, offering of children to Moloch, screening an idolator, going after familiar spirits or wizards, adultery, cursing of parents, blasphemy, stranger coming nigh the tabernacle or the priest's office, usurping the sacerdotal function, forbearing to keep the Passover if not journeying, despising the Word of the Lord, false pretensions to the character of a divine messenger, opposition to the decree of the highest judicial authority, and unchastity before marriage when charged by a husband.

The instruments by which capital punishment was originally inflicted among the Jews were the sword and the stone. From other races, however, they borrowed the method of sawing the offender asunder, choking him to death by a rope into which a stick was twisted, decapitating him by sword or ax, and crucifying him. There was a sort of posthumous punishment visited on guilt of the more heinous sort, the body in some instances, even before life was completely extinct, being stoned, hanged or burned, or the place of its interment covered with a great heap of stones.

PRIMITIVE CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

The death penalty was inflicted in many forms by the people of ancient times. Drowning, boiling, burning, crucifying, and stoning were some of the principal methods resorted to in the punishment of capital offenses.

Death by stoning was long among the prevailing modes of inflicting the death penalty. It was resorted to in barbarous as well as in savage times. History records many cases in which capital punishment took this form.

Still more common among the ancients than stoning was crucifixion. Nearly all the old nations except the Jews practiced it for centuries. The Hebrew race appears to have borrowed the custom from the Romans and to have adopted it not long before the beginning of the Christian Era. This form of punishment seems to have been rare among the Jews before the crucifixion of Christ. Semiramis is credited, by tradition, with the invention of this penalty. The ordinary method of inflicting it was by nailing the victim to a cross, where he was left until dead. Occasionally, however, an innovation was introduced by setting the cross on fire before the victim's death, or by letting wild beasts devour him. Constantine the Great abolished crucifixion about the year A. D. 315.

EXECUTED BY THE CLUB.

A common form of administering the death penalty among the Hottentots and other South African races was by the club, and this custom is still, to some extent, in vogue among the former race. These people had and have no written laws. When an offense was committed for which usage prescribed death, the culprit was seized by order of the chief of the tribe, the kraal or village was called together and the prisoner placed in the center of a circle composed of the leading men of the place, armed with clubs. The chief advances and strikes the prisoner on the head with his club and the other executioners then rush up and finish him.

Death by crucifixion was inflicted on women as well as men by some of the ancients. Mithridates, a Persian soldier, boasted that he killed Cyrus the Younger in the battle of Cunaxa. For this he suffered death by starvation and exposure to the sun, by the order of Artaxerxes Mnemon. Under this torture he lived eighteen days. During several centuries before the Christian Era drowning in a quagmire or in rivers was a form which the death penalty often took. The Hindoos threw persons in the Ganges for the crime of living beyond a certain age; the Spartans destroyed deformed children; under the Ptolemies offenders were vivisected for the benefit of science, and the Venetians threw convicts off the bridge of Sighs.

DEATH FROM THE TARPEIAN ROCK.

One of the most picturesque forms which the death penalty assumed among the Romans was that which consisted of throwing the culprit from the Tarpeian rock. This rock, which was lofty and precipitous, was a promotory on one side of the Capitoline Hill in the Eternal City. Death by this means was usually visited on political offenders merely. It was a punishment for those proven to be traitors or who usurped functions and attempted to exercise powers deemed to imperil the rights and privileges of Roman citizens.

A unique punishment was that inflicted on the Roman General Regulus by the Carthagenians. After capturing him in war they dispatch him to Rome to bring about a treaty of peace. Rome declined, on the advice of Regulus, to enter in to such a compact, and he returned to the Carthagenian camp, although he knew the failure to secure the treaty would mean death to him if he came within the power of that people. He was executed, so the legend says, by being thrown in a barrel studded with spear heads and rolled down hill.

In Japan officials guilty of misdemeanors were and still are, often commanded to perform hari-kari. The victim stabs himself with a sword or dagger and makes one cut to the right and another to the left.

The methods of inflicting death, taking all the ages of history together, have been almost as numerous and diverse as the offences for which the death penalty was decreed. For this purpose the stone, the club, the sword, the ax, the wheel, the spear, the fork, the gibbet, poison, the dagger, the boiling caldron, fire and water, have been employed. Offenders have, in obedience to judicial decree, suffered death on the cross by drawing and quartering, by the garrote and the guillotine and on the gallows. Death has come from slow strangulation by a rope, as was in vogue in China, from the use of boiling oil, which was poured in the joints after they were dislocated by mechanical means, as in France and Germany, by flaying or stripping the skin of the body, as was formerly done in England, and from pressure between planks, on the upper of which great weights were placed, as was also in vogue in England at one time. Every method which human cruelty could impart and human ingenuity devise has been resorted to at one time or other in ancient or medieval days, and among nations professing to be civilized, to administer torture and death.

CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENTS.

One of the most cruel and unusual of punishments was that which the Romans in the latter days of the Republic meted out to those who murdered either of their parents. Luke Owen Pike, M. A., author of the "History of Crime in England," in referring to this punishment says:

"Not in the amphitheater, not at the stake, not on the cross was the parricide to perish. A sack was his winding sheet; in that he was to be sewn up alive and venomous serpents with him. He was to be thrown into the sea, if the sea was near at hand, and if not, into a river, so that the heavens might be hidden from him while still alive and the earth deny him a grave when dead."

Often, however, in addition to the vipers there were a dog, a monkey, and a rooster sewed up in a sack with the victim, who was naked. The sack was usually of leather.

IN THE BOILING CALDRON.

Among the most barbarous forms which the death penalty ever assumed was that of the boiling caldron. To inflict death by this means sulphur, oil, and lead, separately, were sometimes used. Water, however, was the agent generally employed. Boiling to death was first inflicted by statue in England in 1531, during the reign of King Henry VIII. The first person to suffer this penalty in that country was John Roose, cook to the Bishop of Rochester, who poisoned seventeen persons, two of whom died. The poison was administered in porridge. The statute declared that prisoners should be boiled to death without having any "advantage of his clergy." Future offenses of this kind, the law stated, should be deemed equal to high treason in enormity. The statute was repealed not long afterward, but not until several other persons met death in the caldron.

Death by the serpents' bite was a common form of administering capital punishment in the Oriental countries in ancient days, and, it is said, the system has by no means become obsolete yet. Instances are on record in which offenders were bound naked in jungles in which vipers were numerous, and left to suffer a lingering and terrible death from the reptiles' fangs. Men and women, and sometimes children, were thrown into caverns infested by venomous snakes to meet death in its most frightful form in the darkness among the bones of hundreds of persons whose lives had gone out in the same place and by the same means. Many British prisoners, it was told, were subjected to like treatment by the Sepoys during the mutiny about thirty years ago. Even at the present time, it is said, malefactors in some parts of India are thrown into large cages filled with serpents. Travelers in Persia tell stories about similar cruelties being inflicted on criminals in the wilder and more barbarous portions of that country.

ATROCIOUS LEGAL PUNISHMENTS.

The manner of the execution of Ravaillac, who assassinated Henry IV. of France, in 1610, is one of the most cruel on record. He was tied to a rack shaped like a St. Andrews cross. His right hand, within which was fastened the dagger by which he killed the King, was thrust into a slow fire. Pincers then tore the flesh from various parts of his body, and into the wounds they made boiling oil, lead, pitch and rosin were poured. A horse was then attached to each limb, and his joints were drawn asunder. Afterwards the spectators dragged the body through the streets. So great was his power of will that he scarcely uttered a groan while these tortures were being inflicted, and died without implicating any of his accomplices.

Similar in its essential features to the death penalty visited upon Ravaillac was that termed drawing and quartering, which was in vogue in England during several centuries. The head was placed on a pike and exposed on Temple Bar, while the limbs hung up in conspicuous places in the four quarters of the kingdom or on the four gates of the city where the execution took place. The first time the death penalty took this form in England was in the reign of Henry III, in 1241, and it was inflicted for piracy. In later times it was usually administered for treason only. The Earl of Carlisle, who was accused of treason, was one of the most conspicuous persons who met death by this process, which was during the reign of Edward II.

Among the most conspicuous individuals who were executed by decapitation were Charles I., of England, and Mary, Queen of Scotts. Charles' death took place in 1640, and Mary's in 1587. Of course the offenses for which they suffered were purely political. Decapitation has ceased in England, the last case of death by judicial decree which took this form occurring in 1715. In England decapitation was usually performed by the broadax. In France it is done, by the guillotine, and in some of the German States by the sword. This mode of execution, as before mentioned, was and is still in vogue in China, Japan, and other Oriental nations. In that part of the world it was in use from the earliest ages.

Chinese custom ordains that the offender who is to meet death by decapitation shall kneel blindfolded before a block, with the brand of infamy displayed on a board, cloth, or other material on his back. The executioner then steals up behind him, and with a quick, skillful stroke of his keen sword severs the head from the body.

In France, about four centuries ago, beheading by the ax was common. Afterward the two-handed sword came into use. This was employed until the guillotine was introduced.

ON THE GIBBET.

The gibbet was the ancient and medieval form which the gallows assumed. In the early days of the gibbet it was customary, for a time, to hang prisoners accused of heinous offences in chains or irons. The gibbet usually consisted of a projecting beam attached to a single upright post. Sometimes, however, a limb of a tree served the purpose of the beam, as in the case of hanging decreed by the high and august court of Judge Lynch, in the breezy and unconventional society of the Southern and Western portions of the United States, as well as in the Australian gold diggings.

Sometimes in England the prisoner intended for death on the gibbet was carried, with his hands and feet bound, to the place of execution on a cart, and while in that conveyance the rope was placed tightly around his neck, and so adjusted that when the prisoner's entire weight would be upon it, with his legs extended to their full length, his feet would reach to within about a foot of the ground. When all the needful little preliminaries were arranged the horse would be given a sharp stroke of the whip, at which he would start suddenly forward, the cart would be snatched from under the feet of the prisoner, and he would be left hanging in midair.

"BROKEN ON THE WHEEL."

The "wheel" was for centuries a common instrument of torture and death in several countries of Europe. It appears to have come first into use in Germany, where it was employed as early as the tenth century. Francis I., about 1525, introduced it into France. It was employed for a time also in England.

The prisoner designed for death by this method was bound to an instrument rudely resembling a wheel, his legs and arms being separated as far as possible and attached to cross-bars corresponding to spokes. As the wheel revolved the limbs of the victim were fractured by blows from a heavy iron rod delivered below the knees and elbows. Sometimes the rod was held in position mechanically, the limbs of the prisoner, as he was whirled on the wheel, coming in contact with it. Usually, however, the rod was held in the hands of an executioner, who administered the blows as rapidly as he could wield it. In France the torture of this mode of punishment was lessened in many cases by heavy blows being dealt on the head and chest of the victim, so as to shorten life. These blows were called coups de grace, or strokes of mercy.

DEATH BY THE LASH.

Flogging as a death penalty was in vogue among some of the ancient peoples from the earlier ages of the race. During the Roman Republic scourging was administered as a recompense for some of the lighter offences, and at that time it was not usually inflicted as a capital punishment. Death often resulted from it nevertheless. It was rarely, in the latter days of the Republic, given to a Roman citizen, being reserved especially for strangers. In those days it was deemed the most ignominious form of punishment which could be inflicted on a free man.

In some of the Oriental countries scourging is still common. There it takes the form of a bastinado. It is especially frequent in Turkey, China, and Persia. Blows are given by a heavy cudgel, usually on the bottoms of the feet. Death is not generally intended and does not often happen as the result of this punishment in Eastern countries.

Scourging in its severest form is administered in Russia. It is generally, though not always, given for offences against the Czar or some of the higher officials of the Empire, and it is sometimes intended as a death penalty. The instrument used in that country to inflict this punishment is called a knout, and consists of a leather thong attached to a handle, the thong terminating with an iron ring, to which is joined a thick, hard piece of cow's or hog's hide. This form of punishment is inflicted on the bare back of the offender. It is not so common now, even in the Siberian portion of the Czar's domain, as it was formerly.

Flogging, though not as a death penalty, is still employed in Delaware. It was abolished in the United States army and navy long ago, and is much less common in the military or naval service of European nations than it was half a century ago.

In executions by the garrote the prisoner is seated and leans his head back against a support prepared for this purpose. The throat is encircled by an iron collar, through which a screw is turned until it enters the spinal marrow where it unites with the brain. Death comes quicker by this method than by hanging. About a century ago the garrote was simply a rope put around the neck and tightened by the twisting of a stick inserted between the rope and the back of the neck. The garrote had its origin among the Moors and Arabs, and was introduced into Spain in the early days of the Moslem invasion.

THE GALLOWS.

Hanging came into use in England in 1241. The punishment for which it was inflicted was piracy. In the early days of this mode of execution in that country it was customary for the court to decree that a murderer should be hanged in chains on a gibbet near the place where the crime was committed. Executions usually took place at that time two days after sentence was passed, the body of the criminal to be dissected. After a time, however, those severities were abolished. In England hangings took place in public until about a quarter of a century ago. Outside of England and the United States executions in nearly every great country are still public.

The gallows, in its essential features, is the same in all the countries where it is employed.

The Camp-Fire.

BY KINETTE M. LOWATER.

TO-DAY the camp-fire means a scene of gladness and of peace,
From which we shut the world away, and bid its jarring cease;
Here hand meets hand, and heart meets heart, with free and joyous glow;
With song, and jest, and careless mirth, the happy hours o'erflow.

No sentinel, with measured tread, keeps watch upon your way,
No bugle-call, no rolling drum will call you to the fray;
The friends you love are by your side, your pleasant homes are near,
And life's fair afternoon foretells for you a sunset clear.

But once—alas! how long ago! what memories intervene!
The lighted camp fire brought to you no gladness with its gleam,
But, weary with a toilsome march beneath a burning sky,
You sank beside its sluggish blaze to wait the battle-cry.

How fair and far your firesides seemed! How faint grew hope's sweet light,
Amid the deadly cannon's roar, and clamor of the fight!
Scarce dared you think to tread again the pleasant walks of home,
And see the faces that you loved through long, bright years to come.

But God in mercy turned from you the bullet's path away,
And treason's night gave place at last to peace's bright welcome day.
Among the toiling crowd you pass; like them you come and go;
But through your lives a current runs, which none but soldiers know.

He who has once for Freedom's sake borne arms against her foe
Can feel his pulses quicken yet, where'er the camp-fires glow;
Whoever once the musket bore, or wore the army blue,
He greets, wherever they may meet, a comrade tried and true.

Never again your souls shall feel that fierce, bright flame of flame,
Your country gives you rest and peace, and crowns your brows with fame,
Each star still keeps its place upon the banner that you bore,
And on your sons has fallen now the mantle that you wore.

And we who for the cause we loved can only hope and pray,
Now trust that from our glorious land the clouds have passed away;
That if our sons reach manhood now, we'll fear not for their fate;
War, direst of hell's demon brood, lies not for them in wait.

Yet, should her foes menace again our country's very life,
And did she call our sons to bear her banner in the strife,
For holy trust and parting word, this only could we say:
"Go; fight but as your fathers fought—and be as brave as they!"

The Soldier's Life.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

The bursting shell; the gateway rent asunder;
The rattling musketry, the clashing blade;
And ever and anon, in tones of thunder,
The diapason of the cannonade.
—Longfellow.

The brief story of the military experience of Private George W. Lyon, Company C, One Hundred and Fourteenth New York Volunteers, is that of thousands of other good soldiers. He was never absent from his company for a single day during almost three years' service; he was never wounded, but his knapsack and clothing were frequently shot through.

That man marched thousands of miles through Louisiana, Maryland, and Virginia, with his musket on his shoulder, and participated in a dozen severe engagements, saying nothing of skirmishes.

It is written of Marshal Ney that, after the repulse of the Old Guard at Waterloo, which he had vainly tried to lead to victory in the last hour of the battle, although he had not a wound, his dress was actually ragged with the balls that had pierced it.

People read of such strange things, and wonder that they can be. The veterans were very familiar with them.

Not a severe and protracted battle occurred during the war but that, the next day, soldiers exhibited to their comrades their caps shot through, great holes in the sleeves or skirts of their blouses, dents of flying bullets on their gun-stocks, often a canteen perforated through and the water leaked out. I have known soldiers to shake bullets out of their clothes, to find them in their pockets, buried in their knapsacks, or stopped by half a dozen folds of wool and rubber blanket. It was true that "every bullet has its billet," but, fortunately, the message of every one was not death or wounds.

The name of Private James E. Woodmansee, of the same company, suggests the relation of thrilling incidents connected with the regimental colors.

At 2 o'clock on the afternoon of September 19, 1864, the One Hundred and Fourteenth, One Hundred and Sixteenth and One Hundred and Fifty-third New York regiments lay behind a rail-fence at Winchester, stoutly holding that part of the line, and returning bullet for bullet in the face of a fire that killed and wounded scores of men who loaded and fired lying flat. Four color-bearers had fallen in our regiment, and Lieut. Edward E. Breed, of Company H, had taken the flag. So near him that I could have reached out my hand and touched him, I heard a bullet strike him in the breast, making a sound like the blow of a fist. The wound was mortal; he went to the rear and died in four hours. Private Woodmansee seized the flag as it dropped from his hand, and carried it the remainder of the day.

At Cedar Creek, a month later, while our division was striving to stem the rout with which Early was crushing our left, Woodmansee again had the flag, and bore it gallantly. He was instantly killed during that memorable hour, and another hand brought off the colors when the retreat was ordered.

It was in the same hour, when Death was holding high carnival on that field, that I witnessed the death of one of the bravest men that ever wore the blue: Captain Daniel C. Knowlton, Company D.

He was young, gifted, and winning, with a face of almost womanly beauty, and a soul that no danger could appall. "Fear?" Lord Nelson is reported to have said, when a boy: "What is it? I don't know anything about it." If there are such men, Dan Knowlton must have been one of them. He would go into battle with a smile on his handsome face. There must be something in blood that will "tell;" the Major of the Twenty-ninth Maine, also a Knowlton, was struck dead from his horse at Winchester as he was deploying his regiment, "as coolly," says the historian of that regiment, "as though he were on parade;" there was a Colonel Knowlton, of whose conspicuous bravery we read in Revolutionary annals; and it was a mother whose maiden name was Knowlton who gave to his country General Nathaniel Lyon, who saved Missouri to the Union, and whose brilliant career was untimely cut short at the battle of Wilson's Creek. Such stocks as this are heroic of necessity; it is in them.

When the fury of the enemy's attack was launched upon our left in the fog and almost darkness of early morning, Knowlton was in his place in rear of the center of his company as the regiment took its place on the high ground where it was about to be sacrificed. About two hundred and fifty of us were with the colors in that hour, so hardly had two years of war dealt with us. In less than an hour more than a hundred were down, dead and wounded; the company organizations were nearly broken up; the remainder drew closer together. I saw Captain Knowlton seize the rifle and cartridge-box of one of his men, who had fallen, and begin to load and fire. Thus engaged, he suddenly pitched heavily forward, dead. He never spoke; he hardly stirred. A bullet had struck him in the forehead.

The following may be mentioned as an example of that pluck and endurance that was common among the volunteers.

In the battle of Winchester, Private Owen J. Edwards, of the same company, had his arm shattered. He went back through the woods to the field-hospital, and awaiting his turn among the throng of wounded men, his arm was amputated. No doubt he suffered, as all men must who have to endure such an operation. But Edwards was of the kind who do not allow their attention to be engrossed by their own sufferings. He lay quiet for two hours, and then got up and declared that he must do something to help the sufferers around him. And this man with his arm only two hours amputated, actually busied himself carrying water to the wounded men who were begging for it.

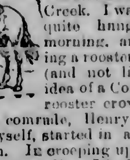
The ludicrous is often mingled with the tragic on the battlefield; it was always so where that quaint character with an odd name, Uriah Borapaugh, was about. Brave as a lion, he had a dry wit that no unfavorable circumstances or surroundings could suppress. He was a veritable Mark Tapley, always jolly, and was certain to furnish mirth to any crowd that he mingled with. At the assault of Port Hudson he was a Sergeant of Company E. When the first assault had failed, and the living who still held the ground in front of the works were taking advantage of all the shelter they could get, Borapaugh, severely wounded, was leaving the field. He was not only severely wounded, but numerously. It was discovered at the field hospital that he had been hit five times, in the face, hand, shoulder, breast, and thigh.

"Lie down there, Bory," called out Lieutenant Colonel Morse; "lie down, or you'll be hit."

"O, I guess not, Colonel," was the reply. "I've dodged all the balls but five, and I guess I can dodge the rest."

This intrepid joker was soon after made Lieutenant, came out of the war as Captain, and has since served a term as Sheriff of his native county.

After a Rooster.



JUST after the two days' fight at Nashville, our regiment was stationed at Bear Creek. I was feeling quite hungry that morning, and, hearing a rooster crowing (and not liking the idea of a Confederate rooster crowing over my head), a comrade, Henry Halderman, and myself, started in a skiff to hunt for him. In creeping up through the brush after landing, I had to step in the road, and, as I did so, I saw seven or eight men in front of a house. They had seen me and I knew it was useless to run, so I hallooed: "Surrender!" They first started toward me, then wheeled and started down the road, and such whipping of horses I never saw before. Fearing they would return and capture us I shouted "Charge!" at the top of my voice.

My comrade came up at about this time, out of breath, briar scratched, and almost frightened to death. He asked what was the matter. Such a racket as there was in that house! I guess they thought it was the whole regiment. We hurried back to the skiff and there met a couple of officers and several privates. We told them to look out or they would run on to the Johnnies; but they just laughed and went on. The officers went straight through the fields to the house and were captured. We hurried back to camp, for we thought the rooster not quite fat enough and he would taste better some other time. We afterward learned we had run onto a Confederate picket post.

The German Guard.

There is no end to the stories told on the German soldier, but to the credit of that class of the country's defenders they were never charged with a lack of bravery and valor when the fight was on.

One night, at a military camp down in Missouri, the word "Potomic" was given to the guards as the password. Among the guards was a young German soldier who had not been in the army very long, but he made a good soldier. He was liable to get his English mixed occasionally, especially his p's and b's. The word was first given out Potomic, but as he got it third hand it went from Potomic to Bottomic, and when he got it the pass word was Buttermilk.

Not long after, the officer who had given out the word presented himself to the Teutonic guard, and gave "Potomic" as the pass word.

"Nicht right," said the guard, "you don't pass mit me right avay mit dot wort."

"But that is the word," said the officer.

"No, you stand;" and he brought his bayonet to a charge. "Potomic don't pass in Missouri, not by considerables."

"Well, what is the word then?" inquired the officer.

"Buttermilk is de wort. Oh, you don't cotch dis guart on ony of dem drick."

"Well then, Buttermilk," said the officer.

"Dot is all right; yust pass right on," said the guard.

The Badge of the Fifteenth.

THE Army of the Potomac adopted a system of division, brigade, and corps badges, which the men wore on their caps and breasts. Some of them were stars and others represented the crescent or new moon. They were very beautiful, and made of gold or silver, fastened on squares or rosettes of silk.

At the time a portion of the Army of the Potomac was sent to join the Army of the Cumberland they brought their habits and customs with them that were new to the Western soldier. Their blazing badges, good clothes, and white gloves were a source of comment among the Western boys, and many jokes at the expense of the Army of the Potomac troops were told in the camps of the Western army.

One day an Irish soldier came struggling along by the headquarters of General Butterfield. He was one of the brave men who had been with Sherman on his march from Memphis to Chattanooga, thence to Knoxville, and was on his return through the rain and storm, footsore and weary, to join his regiment. As he trudged along, "at will," past the headquarters, only bent on joining his own command, he heard the command to "halt" from a soldier in a bright uniform.

"What do you belong to?" said the sentinel.

"Eighth Misshoory, soir," said the Irish soldier.

"What division?"

"Morgan L. Smith's, av course."

"What brigade?"

"Giles Smith's second brigade oov the second division."

"But what army corps?"

"The Fifteenth, you fool. I om one of the heroes of Vicksburg. Anything more, Mr. Sentinel?" asked the soldier.

"Yes; where's your badge?"

"My badge, is it? Inlade, the Fifteenth has a badge. Do you see that?" turning half round and patting his cartridge-box with his hand. "The Potomac chaps as gits home after dark may take the moon and stars wid them, but the Fifteenth prefer a cartridge-box and forty rounds of ammunition. If you Potomacs will kape up wid the Western souldiers yo will see enough stars widout wearin' 'em on yer caps."

Peculiar Incidents in Battle.

IN the midst of battle, when death is reaping as with a whirlwind," says an old veteran, "or just on the eve of attack, or at some other as inopportune a time, some of the most amusing and ludicrous occurrences take place." A few of the peculiar incidents under peculiar circumstances are thus related:

At Gettysburg, when the artillery fire was the hottest, and the circumstances would seem to suggest everything but merriment, a brawny soldier, who seemed happy despite the surroundings, during a lull in the storm broke out singing—

"Backward, roll backward, O, Time, in thy flight, Make me a child again just for this fight."

Another soldier near by yelled out loud enough to be heard above the din of battle:

"Them's my sentiments, and let it be a gal child, at that!"

At the Wilderness battle, May, 1864, the two armies lay near each other at the point where the after view showed that one of the most destructive onslaughts took place. Each command was waiting, in breathless silence, for the order to rush to the conflict. They were so near each other that it was necessary for the men to lie on the ground. As the two armies were thus situated, certainly a most critical moment, the firm tread of a man was heard passing in front of the Federal line with a dozen canteens rattling about his shoulders. He advanced some distance up the line, then halted, and, looking around, the only moving object to be distinctly seen, yelled out, "Darn it, can't some of you fellers tell me where I can get some water?" Immediately, as though his remarks were the signal for the fight, the two armies arose and the fierce din of war set in. What became of that searcher after water was never known, but doubtless he met the fate of a common enemy, and was pierced by the bullets of the contending forces.

At the same battle, when the fight at another point was raging with great fury, a demoralized and slightly wounded soldier came out of the woods, his face pale with fright, and shouted: "Where is the rear, Mister; for God's sake, tell me where is the rear?"

"Hold On, General!"

IN the summer of '62, after the evacuation of Corinth, Nelson's division was in camp for some time near Athens, Ala. One of the camp-followers had a portable bakery, and drove a direct apple-pie trade. Just beyond the guard-line he set his booth, and sold them for twenty-five cents each. All the boys could not get passes to go to the bakery; so when the army speculators got a chance they would put the pies on a board and peddle them in camp for fifty cents each.

General M. thought he would stop it, and when he met a soldier one morning, with ten pies on a board, he stopped him, and, handing him five dollars, ordered him to eat the whole ten. The soldier went to work in dead earnest. As he was finishing the tenth, the General started to go.

"Hold on, General!" said the soldier. "If you will buy me ten more, I'll finish my breakfast!"

IN SPORTING CIRCLES.

The Week a Lively One in All Branches of Sports and Winter Pastimes.

Caruthers Signed by Brooklyn—Dunlap Still with Detroit—Other Deals.

[CHICAGO CORRESPONDENCE.]

There has been much of interest transpiring in the sporting world during the past week, not only in base-ball circles, but in athletic and turf circles as well. The legislative work in base-ball circles has been of the most important character, and deals by ten big clubs for crack ball-players in all positions have been on the carpet almost without intermission. The principal one was that by which the Brooklyn Club secured control of Bob Caruthers, the crack pitcher of the St. Louis Club. It is stated that $8,500 was paid for his release, and that his salary for next season with Brooklyn will be $5,500. The Indianapolis Club has finally secured possession of Paul Hines of the Washington club, and he will play with the Hoosier team next year. Dunlap still remains with Detroit, the deal entered into by Pittsburgh for his services seeming to have fallen through. Clarkson and Pfeffer still remain silent as to their intentions for next season. Whether or not they will play with the Chicago club in 1888 remains a question.

The American Association clubs have decided to charge fifty cents admission next season instead of twenty-five cents, as in seasons past.

It is still undecided as to what club will fill the vacancy in the Association circuit left open by the retirement of the Metropolitans, although it is said that Milwaukee, Toledo, or Newark, N. J., may have the place if they want it.

The new Western league's prospects for a successful season next year are brightening with each month. The clubs are getting some good teams together, and it is likely that the young organization will put up some excellent games of ball.

ATHLETICS.

The newspapers of the country continue to teem with news of John L. Sullivan's great ovation by the English and Irish people in those countries, and during the past month has awakened an interest in sparring and boxing contests equal to that which overspread the country when the "great" Sullivan made his appearance in 1882.

Eminent writers have taken up the subject from a health standpoint, and among those who in years gone by have looked upon sparring contests with abhorrence as the essence of brutality, are to-day men who recommend it as an unequaled method of exercise for physical development. One of the most recent articles of the kind is that from the pen of John Boyle O'Reilly, the poet-athlete, who says of Sullivan:

His success is not wholly attributable to his phenomenal strength. He is the most skillful boxer alive. He hits as straight and almost as rapidly as light. There is always freshness and variety in his blows. He stands firmly on his feet, and strikes with his whole weight; every motion is quick and with a purpose. Lastly, he begins to fight at the first movement. He bewilders his opponent by the incessant rapidity of his blows and their sledgehammer force.

Kilrain is ranked next to Sullivan by Mr. O'Reilly. He is a superb pugilist, but makes the mistake of beginning a fight by sparring instead of fighting. The art of boxing, apart from prize-fighting, is of inestimable value as a means of training, development, and discipline of boys and young men. Every faculty of the body is brought into play, and the mind is naturally strengthened and invigorated by improving its physical environments.

WINTER PASTIMES.

Tobogganing, roller-skating, and gymnasium work are receiving their full share of patronage and attention at the hands of young men and women in the great cities like Chicago and New York. Toboggan slides in New York, New Jersey, and throughout the New England States are in full blast, and while the weather in the Northwest has not yet been as favorable as could be wished, the sport is well under way in Chicago and vicinity. During the approaching winter carnival managers at St. Paul and Montreal will refer to their toboggan scenes as the most attractive to be witnessed there this year as well as in seasons past.

The old pastime of roller skating seems to have taken unto itself a new interest in big centers, such as Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago. Each of these cities has one or two first-class rinks, and not before in the history of roller skating has the class of their patronage been of so high a grade. Three nights in the week the magnificent surface of the Casino Rink in Chicago—one of the few institutions of its kind left standing in the West—is covered with hundreds of the leading young people of this wealthy city. The latest freak of roller-skating devotees is that of organizing into skating clubs, each club having its regular nights for a club meet, and each club adopting some gay colored and tastely designed costume, in which all members appear. When one of these clubs, embracing seventy-five or a hundred members, take possession of the floor, clad in richly colored skating costumes, the effect is brilliant, and enlivening beyond description.

The approach of the annual entertainments of the big amateur athletic organizations and gymnasiums throughout the country, and the character of the programs they are preparing, embracing wrestling and sparring contests, parallel and horizontal bar work, Indian club and dumb-bell competitions, jumping, leaping, ladder work, hand-ball, and English racquet contests, shows the rapidly increasing popularity of gymnasium exercise among the young men of this country. The spirit of interstate and even international competitions seems to be growing, and while base-ball will ever be an absorbingly interesting game for Americans, amateur interstate foot-ball, polo, tug-of-war, wrestling, sparring, and all-around athletic contests between representative teams of prominent athletic organizations in the different States, or even between those of this country and England and Canada, promise to spring into early and rapidly developing popularity.

IN GENERAL.

A seven-foot Star toboggan, owned by Harry Palmer, of Chicago, last week traveled 1,350 feet in 14¼ seconds.

The game of base-ball with dice, introduced by A. G. Spalding & Bros., has become a popular winter parlor game.

The "Peerless" club skate is the most perfect ice skate yet placed on the market. No heel plates are required, and the skate is adjusted by a single click, and as easily removed.

WHERE CO-OPERATION FAILED.

The Plan of the Knights of Labor to Run a Farm on This Principle Given Up.

[Brainerd (Minn.) special.]

The experiment of the Knights of Labor with a co-operative farm, known as the Crow Wing County scheme, is now a pronounced failure. The enterprise was commenced under flattering prospects on a large tract of land situated in the south part of this county, upon which there was plenty of timber, both pine and oak. A saw-mill was put up, which was expected to produce lumber for large buildings, but none of the projects seemed to materialize, and after two years of the experiment leading members of the colony have permanently disagreed, and all but one departed. The Sheriff a few days ago sold the mill under foreclosure. H. S. Strong, who has lived with the colony editing the paper, the Journal, says the trouble arose from disagreements of the managers, Mr. Rankin and Mr. Young. It is claimed that Mr. Rankin has not accounted for moneys collected, but this is as strongly denied. At present everybody has left the farm but Mr. Rankin.

Inter-Ocean: Organized labor is at present its own worst enemy.

The czar of Russia changed tailors because he found his man was supplying his officers cheaper than he was getting his own made.

The Detroit Tribune says: "If President Cleveland hung up his stocking he probably got what he got when he wrote his message—got his foot in it."

Atlanta Constitution: The talk of running a Republican campaign in the South next year is the purest nonsense. The leaders know that their party in this section is dead.

Chairman Dickey gets $3,000 a year for trying to keep the National prohibition party in line. As that is a bigger salary than he received as professor in Albion College, why shouldn't he work zealously to perpetuate the chairmanship?

Prohibitionists will either have to come to the platform of making the liquor question a local question, or turn the government over to the rule of whiskey. If they could elect a President even it would not add anything to temperance reform.

A great many Republicans have their eyes on Senator Allison. He is a man who will bear study. His record is clean. There will be no trouble to find the right man next June. A half dozen States can furnish candidates with records unsullied.

The President's party are in favor of "protection" from all such Republican majorities as they have up in Dakota. Instead of taking in Dakota, they would like to kick Iowa, Kansas and Illinois out if they could, and make a sure thing of it next year.

Information regarding the condition of the German Crown Prince is very encouraging. It appears to be not improbable that he will entirely recover his health. His recovery would be a great triumph for Dr. Mackenzie, as well as a blessing to the German people.

Seventy-five per cent. of the delegates of a Republican conference recently held at Indianapolis were for Blaine for President; about 20 per cent. were for Harrison, and 5 per cent. for Sherman. This is about the average of Republican opinion throughout the country.

The tone of dispatches from Europe is very warlike. If it comes it will be the greatest war of modern times, as it would be Germany, Austria, Italy and Turkey against Russia and France. England would also be likely to be involved against Russia. In such event as a general continental war next year, everything made or grown in America would command great prices.

As the London Times views it, the policy set forth in Mr. Cleveland's message "may not establish 'free trade' in the strict sense of the term, but it will to a great extent make trade free." Well, what more do the free traders want? When they have succeeded in breaking down American manufactures, reducing the wages of American mechanics, and in making trade "to a great extent" free, they will probably be satisfied with the mischief they will have accomplished.

Cleveland Leader: Looking back to the time when the Democratic party went out of power in 1861 to enter into a wicked conspiracy for the destruction of the Union, and calling to mind the magnificent totals which express the grandeur, power, peace and prosperity of the Nation to-day, we are almost convinced that Senator Beck must have been inspired at the moment when, from his seat in the Senate, he declared that "the Republican party and its financial policy brought the country into its present condition."

New York Tribune: If British manufacturers can convert us to the beauties of depending upon them for supplies, and closing American mills and foundries, they have an unquestioned right to spend their money in that way. * * * It is the height of folly to give a Democratic administration credit for averting disasters which the Republican party alone prevented by its increased strength in the House, and its undisturbed possession of the Senate. The appeal made to the business community in 1884 can be repeated next year with cumulative force.

"Three Democratic Senators will vote against the confirmation of Lamar," says a prominent Democratic politician, "Sawyer, of Wisconsin, and Evarts, of New York, as well as Riddleberger, of Virginia, will vote for Lamar. Riddleberger's vote makes a tie, ordinarily, and with Evarts and Sawyer, Lamar would pull through if the Democrats would vote solidly for him. I cannot say that I am sorry; Cleveland has a faculty for giving favors to the South, and ignoring us of the North. But, he might have selected better timber than the only man from that section who is on record as the defender of Jefferson Davis."

The death of Hon. S. C. Moffatt necessitates a special election for congressman in the 11th district. The canvas for the position has already begun, with Jay A. Hubbell in the lead. Thus far in Michigan there have been but four special elections for Congressman. Charles E. Stuart, of Kalamazoo, was elected to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Edward Bradley, in 1847. Wilder D. Foster, of Grand Rapids, was elected to fill the vacancy caused by the promotion of T. W. Ferry to the Senate. W. B. Williams was chosen in 1873 to fill the vacancy caused by the death of W. D. Foster, and J. T. Rich was chosen at a special election to fill the vacancy caused by O. D. Conger's promotion.

New York Tribune: The tariff of 1824 immediately lifted us out of the mire of want and replenished our treasury. The tariff of 1828 lifted us still higher, indeed so high that it caused the indignation of the Democrats and threats of secession which brought about the compromise of 1833. What was the result? Before 1840 the Government had to borrow money to keep the wheels in motion. With a protective tariff in 1842 the country again revived and prospered until the free trade tariff of 1846 again caused poverty and want, so that in 1857 the government had again to resort to borrowing at the ruinous interest of 12 per cent. Thus we found it in 1860. Immediately a protective tariff was enacted, and here we are now the richest and most prosperous nation on the face of the earth. This seems to annoy the Democrats so much that it proves they do not desire the welfare of the country but only the success of their party—a party which has always dragged us down to poverty and want.

Detroit Tribune on the tariff: A great many Democrats are trying to find a back door to the President's message leading out to a protection bridge. The exit doesn't seem to be there. * * * There probably isn't a paper in the country that will step higher to get over a pun without killing it than the Tribune, but, pun or no pun, we are going to say right here that in this wool tariff fight the free traders are going to get worsted. * * * The profit goes to the seller. Put wool on the free list and you greatly increase the number of foreign sellers and greatly decrease the number of sellers at home. Free trade sends your money out of the country. Protection keeps your money at home. * * * Boiled down to a few words, the way to revise the tariff is to put a duty on everything that we can produce with profit under protection, and admit free everything that we cannot produce. That is protection to American industries and American labor, and the political party that fights that principle is a dead duck.

The Irish World, which is the ablest journal of its kind published in the United States—or anywhere else—has this to say of Mr. Blaine's remarks on the tariff question: "Mr. Blaine puts the question of free trade in a nutshell when he says, 'How are we to export staple fabrics to Europe, and how are we to manufacture them cheaper than they do in Europe, unless we get cheaper labor than they have in Europe? * * * Whenever we can force carpenters, masons, iron-workers and mechanics in every department to work as cheaply and live as poorly in the United States as similar workmen in Europe, we can, of course, manufacture just as cheaply as they do in England and France.' Every wage-worker will instantly recognize the force of this argument. The value set on the labor that enters into it determines the price of every American article. The American manufacturer who pays his employes so much more than the European manufacturer must lower wages if through the operation of free trade he has to compete in the same market with one who spends much less than he does. Under these circumstances the American manufacturer would be compelled either to go out of business or lower the standard of wages. It would be an act of folly for him to try and place on the market manufactured articles that would cost so much more than the foreign articles with which they would be obliged to compete. The only way in which he could hold his own would be for him to reduce the wages of his employes. This reduction would necessitate a lowering in the standard of living on the part of the wage-workers.

[The SENTINEL rises to remark that it is a Charlevoix man who keeps it humming.] —— Frank Smith, better known as "Little Frank," "Portugese Frank," etc., died Thursday night last, after a long illness. A post mortem examination, conducted by Dr. Bennett, assisted by Drs. Foster, Warne and LeFevre, revealed the cause of his death to be an extensive cancerous growth on the liver, intestines and contiguous organs.—— Joseph Huick, a boy about 14 years old, while felling trees on his father's farm near the Bohemian settlement, last week Tuesday, was struck and instantly killed by the tree he was cutting down.—— French & Sutton have dissolved partnership. Mr. Sutton retires, and Mr. French assumes all debts and credits, and continues business at the old stand. —— F. E. Fogg, formerly of this place, is keeping a restaurant at St. Ignace, and doing well.—— Jacob Keller and Miss Delia Ensign were married Saturday night last.

When Thou Art Near.

When thou art near the cares which on me prey,
And seem my very soul to overweigh,
Vanish as swift as Night's dark clouds, which stay
Across the skies and Dawn's glad portals ...
Blown far and wide by winds of new-born day,
Some hidden grief, now long remembered, may Remain, but holdeth not that severe sway
Of years gone by—for peace and joy I feel
When thou art near.

And, dear one, if, while being far away,
From me some unknown sorrow or ... and buy
Itself hard on my heart, then I would kneel
And pray to Him to send thee back to heal
The wounds which pain me, but no longer slay,
When thou art near.

—William Hurlbut Tyler.

THE OLD HOMESTEAD.

"Hello, Jim! Where have you been lately?" shouted a broker the other evening to a portly, finely-dressed man in the corridor of the St. James. The gentleman stopped, shook hands with his friend, and replied: "I've been home to see my old father and mother, the first time in sixteen years, and I tell you old man, I wouldn't have missed the visit for all my fortune."

"Kinder good to visit your boyhood home, eh?"

"You bet. Sit down. I was just thinking about the old folks and feel talkative. If you have a few moments to spare, sit down, light a cigar, and listen to a story of a rich man who had almost forgotten his father and mother."

They sat down and the man told his story.

"How I came to visit my home happened in a curious way. Six weeks ago I went down to Fire island fishing. I had a lunch put up at Crook & Nash's, and you can imagine my astonishment when I opened the hamper to find a package of crackers wrapped up in a piece of newspaper. That newspaper was the little patent inside country weekly published at my home in Wisconsin. I read every word of it, advertisements and all. There was George Kellogg, who was a schoolmate of mine, advertising hams and salt pork, and another was postmaster. By George! it made me homesick, and I determined then and there to go home, and go home I did.

"In the first place I must tell you how I came to New York. I had a tiff with my father and left home. I finally turned up in New York with a dollar in my pocket. I got a job running a freight elevator in the very house in which I am now a partner. My haste to get rich drove the thoughts of my parents from me, and when I did think of them the hard words that my father last spoke to me rankled in my bosom. Well, I went home. I didn't see much change in Chicago, but the magnificent new depot in Milwaukee I thought was an improvement on the old shed that they used to have. It was only thirty miles from Milwaukee to my home, and I tell you, John, that train seemed to creep. I was actually worse than a school-boy going home for a vacation. At last we neared the town. Familiar sights met my eyes, and, darn it all, they filled with tears. There was Bill Lyman's red barn, just the same, but, great Scott! what were all of the other houses? We rode nearly a mile before coming to the depot, through houses where only occasionally I saw one that was familiar. The town had grown to ten times its size when I knew it. The train stopped and I jumped off. Not a face in sight that I knew, and I started down the platform to go home. In the office door stood the station agent. I walked and said: 'Howdy, Mr. Collins?'

"He stared at me and replied, 'You have got the best of me, sir.'

"I told him who I was and what I had been doing in New York, and he didn't make any bones in talking to me. Said he: 'It's about time you came home. You in New York rich, and your father scratching gravel to get a bare living.'

"I tell you, John, it knocked me all in a heap. I thought that my father had enough to live upon comfortably. Then a notion struck me. Before going home I telegraphed to Chicago to one of our correspondents there to send me $1,000 by first mail. Then I went into Mr. Collins' back office, got my trunk in there, and put on an old hand-me-down suit that I used for fishing and hunting. My plug hat I replaced by a soft hat, took my valise in my hand, and went home. Somehow the place didn't look right. The currant bushes had been dug up from the front yard and the fence was gone. All the old locust trees had been cut down and young maples were planted. The house looked smaller somehow, too. But I went up to the front door and rang the bell. Mother came to the door and said: 'We don't wish to buy anything to-day sir.'

"It didn't take a minute to survey her from head to foot. Neatly dressed, John, but a patch and a darn here and there, her hair streaked with gray, her face thin, drawn and wrinkled. Yet over her eye-glasses shone those good, honest, benevolent eyes. I stood staring at her and then she began staring at me. I saw the blood rush to her face, and then with a great sob she threw herself upon me and nervously clasped me around the neck, hysterically crying: 'It's Jimmy! it's Jimmy!'

"Then I cried, too, John. I just broke down and cried like a baby. She got me into the house, hugging and kissing me, and then she went to the back door and shouted 'George!'

"Father came in a moment and from the kitchen asked, 'What do you want, Caroline?'

"Then he came in. He knew me in a moment. He stuck out his hand and grasped mine, and said, sternly, 'Well, young man, do you propose to behave yourself now?'

"He tried to put on a brave front, but he broke down. There we three sat, like whipped school children, all whimpering. At last supper-time came and mother went out to prepare it. I went into the kitchen with her.

"'Where do you live, Jimmy? she asked.

"'In New York,' I replied.

"'What are you working at now, Jimmy?'

"'I'm working in a dry goods store.'

"'Then I suppose you don't live very high, for I hear tell of them city clerks what don't get enough money to keep body and soul together. So I'll just tell you, Jimmy, we got nothing but roast spareribs for supper. We ain't got any money now, Jimmy. We're poorer nor Job's turkey.'

"I told her that I would be delighted with the spareribs, and to tell the truth, John, I haven't eaten a meal in New York that tasted as well as those crisp roasted spareribs did. I spent the evening playing checkers with father, while mother sat by telling me all about their misfortunes from old white Mosley getting drowned in the pond to father's signing a note for a friend and having to mortgage the place to pay it. The mortgage was due inside of a week, and not a cent to meet it with—just $800. She supposed they would be turned out of house and home, but in my mind I supposed they wouldn't. At last 9 o'clock came, and father said: 'Jim, go out to the barn and see if Nit is all right. Bring in an armful of old shingles that are just inside the door, and fill up the water pail. Then we'll go off to bed and get up early and go a-fishing.'

"I didn't say a word, but I went out to the barn, bedded down the horse, broke up an armful of shingles, pumped a pail of water, filled the wood-box, and then all went to bed.

"Father called me at 4:30 in the morning, and while he was getting a cup of coffee I slipped over to the depot and got my best brass rod. Father took nothing but a trolling-line and spoon hook. He rowed the boat with his trolling-line in his mouth, while I stood in the stern with a silver shiner rigged on. Now, John, I never saw a man catch fish like he did. To make a long story short, he caught four bass and five pickerel and I never got a bite.

"At noon we went ashore, and father went home, while I went to the post-office. I got a letter from Chicago with a check for $1,000 in it. With some trouble I got it cashed, getting paid in $5 and $10 bills, making quite a roll. I then got a roast joint of beef and a lot of delicacies and had them sent home. The joint was in the oven. Mother had put on her only silk dress, and father had donned his Sunday-go-to-meeting clothes, none too good either. This is where I played a joke on the old folks. Mother was in the kitchen watching the roast. Father was out to the barn, and I had a clear coast. I dumped the sugar out of the old blue bowl, put the $1,000 in it, and placed the cover on again. At last, supper was ready. Father asked a blessing over it, and he actually trembled when he stuck his knife in the roast.

"'We haven't had a piece of meat like this in five years, Jim,' he said, and mother put in with 'And we have not had any coffee in a year, only when we went a-visitin'.'

"Then she poured out the coffee and lifted the cover of the sugar bowl, asking as she did so: 'How many spoons, Jimmy?'

"Then she struck something that wasn't sugar. She picked up the bowl and peered into it. 'Aha Master Jimmy, playing your old tricks on your mammy, eh? Well, boys will be boys.'

"Then she gasped for breath. She saw it was money. She looked at me, then at father, and then with trembling hands she drew the great roll of bills out.'

"Ha! ha! ha! I can see father now as he stood there then on tiptoe, with his knife in one hand, fork in the other, and his eyes fairly bulged out of his head. But it was too much for mother. She raised her eyes to heaven and said slowly: 'Put your trust in the Lord, for he will provide.'

"Then she fainted away. Well, John, there's not much more to tell. We threw water in her face and brought her to, and then we demolished that dinner, mother all the time saying: 'My boy Jimmy! My boy Jimmy!'

"I stayed at home a month. I fixed up the place, paid off the debts, had a good time, and came back again to New York. I am going to send $50 home every week. I tell you, John, it's mighty nice to have a home."

John was looking steadily at the head of his cane. When he spoke he took Jim by the hand and said:

"Jim, old friend, what you told me has affected me greatly. I haven't heard from my old home way up in Maine for ten years. I'm going home to-morrow."—New York Sun.

Monkeys Opening Oysters.

So many people have expressed their surprise at hearing that I constantly saw monkeys breaking open oysters with a stone on the islands off South Burmah, that may be of interest to give a short description of their method of using such a tool. The low-water rocks of the islands of the Mergui Archipelago are covered with oysters, large and small. A monkey, probably macacus cynomolgus, which infest these islands, prowls about the shore when the tide is low, opening the rock oysters by striking the base of the upper halves until it dislocates and breaks up. He then extracts the oyster with his finger and thumb, occasionally putting his mouth straight to the broken shell. On disturbing them I generally found that they had selected a stone more apparently for convenience in handling than for its value as a hammer, and it was smaller in proportion to what a human being would have selected for a proportionate amount of work. In short, it was usually a stone they could get their fingers around. As the rocks crop up through the low-water mud, the stone had to be brought from high-water mark, this distance varying from ten to eighty yards. This monkey has chosen the easiest way to open the rock-oyster—viz: to dislocate the halves by a blow on the base of the upper one, and to break the shell over the attaching muscle. The gibbon also frequents these islands, but I never saw one of them on the beach.—Nature.

About Watches.

"A first-class watch should last for a hundred years, if properly taken care of," said a well-known watchmaker to a reporter.

"The reason that they wear out is the fault of the owner and not of the watch. In the first place, a watch should be cleaned and oiled once in every eighteen months. If this is not done the oil which lubricates the works will dry and the works wear out by friction. Another mistake is to wear a watch in an outside pocket where it is liable to be jammed. I have known more watches ruined by billiard-playing than anything else. In leaning over to make a long shot the vest pocket is frequently brought in violent contact with the table, and this repeated jarring cannot fail to injure the works. The best watches are made to-day in England. They are masterpieces of workmanship. I should say that the American watch ranks next, and those manufactured in Switzerland third in order. Some watches are made to run eight days with one winding, but they will never become popular. Their owners almost always forget to wind them up on the eighth day. I know of only one or two in this country. They are made in Switzerland. The usual length of time modern watches are calculated to run with one winding is from thirty to thirty-six hours."—New York Mail and Express.

Why am I a Jew?

In less than one year my people will enter the thirty-third century of its separate existence as a nation and now you ask me why I am a Jew! Certes, the reason must be strong, since the same reason has animated my ancestors all these centuries. Why am I a Jew? Because in the spring month of the year 2418 A. M. my fathers went forth from Egypt as a nation designed to walk in the van of human progress called into existence only for the mere purpose of leading, as the first-born of God, His other children of earth to Him, the Father of all. I am a Jew because I believe that the Jew is a necessity of the world. I am a Jew because I recognize the role of my nation to be that of the servant of God in ministering to mankind's greatest wants. I am a Jew because I understand and acknowledge that my people has no logical reason for its existence on the stage of history, in the face of tempests, changing scenes, "war's alarms and excursions"—in the face of all ethnological law and historic experience—except as that conservative principle without which progress becomes unreal and evanescent, and civilization unstable.—North American Review.

A Remarkable Well.

A very interesting event has occurred near Parkersburg, W. Va. A well has been sunk to the depth of thirty feet on a mountain-side farm in that vicinity, and the water in it registers the rise and fall in a stream a thousand feet below in the valley. Such is the information, at least which is given to the world through the press dispatches. The heads of the neighboring farmers have been scratched until they are tender, but without producing a solution of the problem as to why the well water should rise and fall in unison with that of the river.

At this distance it would appear that when it rains the river rises, and that the well supplies in a like manner are simultaneously reinforced. It would be well for one of the puzzled rustic philosophers to build a temporary dam in the river in a dry season, and then if the water in the well a thousand feet up the mountain side rises as the dam fills he may report progress and we will call some Bancroftian intellect into the field and settle the matter.—Ex.

A Simple Telephone.

Cut with a circle saw from an inch board two circular rims twelve inches in diameter, the open space in the center being seven inches in diameter, one of them for each end of the line. Then glue on one side of the rim four thicknesses of heavy manilla paper, drawing them as tightly as possible—it would also be well to drive in a few large-head carpet-tacks about an inch apart. On the other side of the rim glue on two thicknesses of paper, having in the center an opening three inches in diameter.

The wire to be used is copper, about the thickness of a knitting-needle. To fasten the wire to the poles, nail a short cross-piece to the top from which to tie the wire with a heavy cotton cord, leaving it loose enough so that the wire will not touch the wood. The opening in the side of the building should also be large enough not to interfere with the wire. Then make an opening in the center of the four thicknesses of paper barely large enough to receive the wire. Draw the wire tight and give it a few twists around a nail laid flatwise on the inner side of the paper. Between the back of the transmitter and the side of the room place near the edge four small blocks or spools. To call, tap on the nail with any small piece of iron. By this arrangement one can communicate from his house to that of a near neighbor with but small expense.

Acupuncture.

Shampooing, acupuncture, or piercing of the body with needles, and the burning of moxas on the skin, have from the earliest times formed the staple of Japanese surgical skill. The blind and dumb have always been educated in the first two, and have acquired extraordinary skill as shampooers in many muscular and intestinal complaints. They are allowed to combine music and money-lending with their main calling, and go about toward evening with a low whistle for a street cry. The best of these shampooers know all the superficial muscles, and their services are called in for headache, hysteria, and paralysis. Degrees, too, were conferred on them, with ceremonial robes and white wands surmounted by wooden balls. The medical school, established A. D. 669, had a professor of shampooing with ten pupils, and another of acupuncture with twenty. In 820 five acupuncturists were attached to the imperial palace, being paid by the month, and obliged to keep up their knowledge of their own subject as well as of the pulse, surgery, botany, and prescribing, by studying particular books. Acupuncture is not an invention of the Japanese, the first treatise on it being attributed to a Chinese under the Sung dynasty, although the form of the needles used and the mode of their employment have been much improved upon by them; tubular needles, for instance, were invented in 1688. It should not be forgotten that Asclepiades, in the first century of our era, recommended needle-puncture for dropsy. The operation consists in driving fine gold, silver or steel needles from one-half to three-quarters of an inch into the flesh. The needles are of various forms and have spirally grooved handles for the better twirling of the instrument. The operator holds a needle lightly with his left hand, resting the point upon the skin of the patient. He then inserts it by a slight tap on the handle, given with a small wooden mallet held in the right hand. The needle is then gently pushed and twirled until it penetrates to the proper depth, and after a few seconds is slowly withdrawn in the same manner, the skin about the puncture being subsequently chafed for a few moments. The number of perforations made at one time varies from one to twenty, and they are oftenest made in the abdomen, to which, however, they are not confined: special treatises laying down the spots to be pierced in various diseases, and one division of study distinguishing on the back of the so-called hollow spots (more than a hundred in number)—"where the ends of the nerve fibres are found"—for the application of the needle or the moxa. A faint effort was made to introduce the Japanese needles into England and France, in 1825, but although combined with electricity, it came to nothing.—Westminster Review.

DISCUSSING A REDUCTION.

A Plan to Cut Down the Revenue $62,000,000.

THE Washington correspondent of the Chicago Tribune telegraphs as follows:

A so-called Administration plan for tariff reduction is being discussed to-day. It is not yet in the shape of a bill, and is only thrown out as a "feeler," consisting mainly of figures furnished at the Treasury Department. According to this plan $62,000,000 is set down as the amount of revenue to be cut off, of which $12,000,000 is to come from adding salt, lumber, wool, and coal to the free list, and the other $50,000,000 will come from reduced duties on various manufactured articles, including iron and woolen goods. Although a bill containing these features has not actually been drawn, it is certain that one something like it will be presented as representing the views of the Administration. The President does not look with favor upon a reduction of any other revenues than those derived from customs duties, and the bill presented by those who represent him will not include anything which looks like taking the tax from tobacco. A dozen schemes for reduction are being discussed, but while the one proposing the reduction of $62,000,000 from customs duties possibly comes nearest representing the President's views none of them has been officially stamped the "administration bill."

convention drafted and adopted the following memorial to Congress:

To the Congress of the United States:

The people of Dakota Territory, assembled in delegate convention, respectfully represent that they are desirous of the admission of the Territory of Dakota as a State into the Federal Union. We are possessed of the requisite population to entitle Dakota to representation in the House of Representatives in case of admission, and we, therefore, earnestly petition for the passage by Congress of an enabling act authorizing the election of delegates to a convention for the purpose of preparing a constitution, republican in form, to the end that the constitution so framed may be submitted to a vote of the people of said Territory at the next general election for ratification, and if ratified that Dakota be admitted into the Union as the State of Dakota.

A committee consisting of two from each judicial district and three at large was appointed to visit Washington and urge admission.

STERLING P. ROUNDS, President of the Omaha Republican Newspaper Company, died in that city a few days ago. He had been ill ten days from pneumonia, but his death was directly due to heart disease.

Sterling Parker Rounds was a native of Vermont and was born in June, 1828. He learned the printer's trade in Buffalo, after which he went to Racine, Wis., where he started a weekly paper. He was married in Racine Dec 8, 1851, and has three sons and two daughters living. One daughter is the wife of O. H. Rothaker, the journalist. After his marriage Mr Rounds removed to Milwaukee and started the News as a weekly paper. He afterward went to Chicago and opened a large job printing office on State street, in company with James J. Langdon. They were burned out by the fire, but opened an office soon after on Monroe street, where they continued business until their failure five years later. In 1882 Mr. Rounds was appointed public printer by President Garfield, and held the office until the incoming of the present administration. A year ago in September he bought the Omaha Republican, and has lived there since. His father is still living at Eureka, Wis. He has a brother in Milwaukee and a sister at Aurora, Ill.

THE Denver, Utah and Pacific Railroad shops at Denver were wrecked by the ex-

...missionaries, writing from Honan Province under the date of Oct. 28, says: "The newly gathered crops, houses, and trees are all swept away, involving fearful loss of life. The country was covered with fine winter grain, which is gone, and implies the complete destruction of next year's crop. 'Bread, bread!' is the cry of thousands who are on the river bank. Benevolent people go in boats and throw bread among the masses here and there, but it is nothing compared with the requirements. The mass of people is being increased by the continual arrivals even more hungry than the last. There they sit, clothed, hungry, and dejected, without rags to wear or food. Mat huts are being erected for them, but what it will be in two months cannot be conceived. Misery is being increased owing to the bitter cold weather."

A CABLE dispatch from London says: "The persistent optimism which has all along prevailed in the English Foreign Office regarding the prospects of European war has at last disappeared. The tenor of the dispatches now received from the English representatives on the Continent distinctly shows that aggressive preparations are being pushed to the utmost on the German and Austrian frontiers and that everything is in readiness for an invasion of Poland. It is very doubtful, now, whether any pretense of humility that may be made by Russia, or any attempt at suave diplomatic procrastination can long prevent wholesale execution of the hostile plan which has been fully agreed on by the allies to weaken and despoil her on her southern and western borders."

ST. PETERSBURG advices say that the War Department is supplying the troops with special ammunition pouches for Berdan rifles, which will enable each man to fire fourteen shots per minute. The projected alteration in the rifle was abandoned, so the dispatches say, because, in view of the gravity of the situation, it was thought there would not be sufficient time to make the change.

Kilrain fought at 181 pounds and Smith at 180 pounds, a heavier weight than he has fought at heretofore. It was a lively and energetic battle for the first three rounds—a quick give-and-take, with close spar-

Olcott of New York; Eighth, C. S. Forbes of Vermont; Ninth, John Mitchell, Jr., of Virginia.

The report was adopted, and a vote of thanks was tendered to the Hon. D. J. Ryan for the able and impartial manner in which he had discharged the duties of temporary chairman.

Senator Evarts was introduced, and said that the illusion of the democratic party, that it always nominated a man greater than the party, had been dispelled by the elevation of Mr. Cleveland. He thought the democrats might try to explain away the President's message. Continuing he said:

"But we must hold him to it. We have the right to that message. The laboring class who read that message will see through the phrases in which it is disguised his real position toward them. Some people think that the republican senate will prevent the President from doing wrong. A nice way, that, for people to elect a President, believing that the opposite party will keep him straight."

The Committee on Permanent Organization reported in favor of forming a national league of Republican clubs, and to leave the matter of local club organization to the various committees of the different cities. The Chairman said that the New York Republican Club had submitted to the committee plans for the formation of national and State leagues, and that they had been adopted with a few changes. A draft for a constitution for the national organization, to be known as the "Republican League of the United States," was presented. A President, three Vice Presidents, and a Secretary and Treasurer are to be the officers. A draft of a constitution for State leagues was also presented. The latter are to hold annual conventions, but are not to express any preference for any candidate before any political convention. Any club having twenty members and duly organized is entitled to membership in State Leagues. A convention of the League during the year 1888 is also provided for. During the recess which followed the permanent organization the New York delegation selected these candidates for officers of the National League: For President, Chauncey M. Depew; for Vice President for New York, James E. Blanchard; for Executive Committeeman for New York, Edgar T. Brackett.

the present protective system was adopted. These important results have been accomplished by the vast increase of home competition, with its concurrent advantage of an equal increase in the employment of labor, both skilled and unskilled, and in the recompense of labor. It has been accompanied also by a change in the balance of trade with foreign countries, enabling us to retain at home the gold and silver products of our mines and our earnings, instead of sending them abroad for the enhancement of aliens. Consequently in proportion as our capital increased the rates of interest were reduced to a degree never before known, lessening the charges on farms and facilitating all mercantile manufacturing enterprises.

We, therefore, appealing to the foregoing history of the Republican party, and that of the country identified with it, make the following declarations:

1. We emphatically refuse to abandon the policy of home protection on which our unexampled national progress and prosperity are founded.

2. The effect of the Democratic policy would be disastrous by transferring many of our industries to England and robbing our working people of their employment and wages for the benefit of British manufacturers, by exhausting our accumulated capital in the payment of foreign debts incurred for imported merchandise, and by damaging the entire system of our industrial and commercial intercourse. We protest against it in the name of all American labor and of all American enterprise.

3. We recognize in the message of the Lead of the Democratic party a tender to our country of the choice between supporting the laborers and the industries of Great Britain and Europe generally on the one hand, and on the other the support of the laboring men and industrial enterprise of America. We respectfully decline the former which he recommends and will stand by our people when we elect a President.

4. The principle of protection is not founded upon the interests of any one section, or of any one class of individuals, but upon the interests of the entire country. Its supreme object is to render America independent of Europe, to render the United States entirely self-sustaining, to keep our money at home and give employment to our own working people, to substitute home competition for foreign, to build up towns and villages, to encourage agriculture and enhance the value of farms, to provide home markets for the farmer, to adapt our manufactures to our domestic wants, to promote the opening of rapid and cheap communication between the States and Territories, to open mines, and to develop all the vast resources of our country so richly blessed of God in all that is needed to make a people great, contented and happy. While the Republican party has since the war repeatedly cut down taxation and has uniformly, when in power, kept the surplus within safe limits, the Democracy have shown themselves incompetent for either duty, and by persistently refusing any reduction of taxes unless coupled with a destructive assault on American indus-

THAT LITTLE GRAVE.

BY JEFFIE FORBUSH HANAFORD.

You ask me why I am silent
And tears are in my eyes,
I look yonder at that little grave;
There all my joy lies.
Buried deep 'neath the daisies
My little one is at rest.
Do you ask me now, kind friend,
Why sorrow fills my breast?

Do you ask me why I am weeping
Do you wonder I do not smile?
So long it seems since baby died,
Yet 'tis only a little while
But my heart is almost breaking,
And I try in vain to be brave,
For all my hopes are buried
Deep in that little grave

Soon I shall go and meet her
In the beautiful realms above;
I know my darling awaits me,
Pure as a snow-white dove
That, indeed, is a blessed thought,
Tho' tears will fill my eyes,
Whenever I look at that little grave
Where my babe in heaven lies.

whistle that in a few minutes caused him to be surrounded by his comrades. Skulking behind them stood the still frightened darky.

The Indians appeared quite careless of the coming and going of their white brethren. But Iron Dan had for his own reasons been very kind and generous to them. He had brought them more than one fine horse, and several small herds of cattle and sheep, besides many other presents, trifling in themselves, but dear to the Indian's heart.

There was still another bond between the lawless band and themselves, they too were leagued against the white settlers—the Indian's bitterest and most encroaching enemies.

The order to start for Satan's Roost was given, and in less than a half hour the little party had begun their toilsome, perilous march over the mountains.

Skete hadn't the least idea where they were going. His woolly head was all in a chaos inwardly, but he was growing somewhat calmer now and was beginning to realize that he was not to be harmed if he obeyed the orders of cruel Jim Gregory.

The mountains themselves had a soothing influence. Skete felt quite at home climbing up their steep sides and winding around and in the huge canyons. The pines were green and homelike, and the stray warblers made his heart beat faster and his tongue longed to join in with their songs, if he had but dared.

What was to become of him, how he was ever to escape from these mountain fastnesses or out of Jim Gregory's clutches, Skete had not the faintest conception. That he would escape finally and see his dear Miss Nora once more, his anxious, loving heart assured him. Skete was but a child after all, and the hand of oppression had made him submissive and gentle. The outrage that had been done, of which he

WHOLESOME RECREATION.

Discourse by Dr. Talmage in the Brooklyn Tabernacle.

The Gymnasium as a Means of Recuperating Mental and Physical Energies—Music a Source of Illimitable Recreation and Amusement.

BROOKLYN, Dec. 18.—At the Tabernacle this morning the whole congregation sang the hymn beginning:

The hill of Zion yields
A thousand sacred sweets
Before we reach the heavenly fields
Or walk the golden streets.

The Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., preached on "Recreations Good and Bad," taking two texts: I Cor. vii, 31: "They that use this world, as not abusing it;" and Judges xvi, 25: "And it came to pass, when their hearts were merry, that they said, Call for Samson, that he may make us sport. And they called for Samson out of the prison house; and he made them sport." Dr. Talmage said:

We are entering the gayest season of the year. The winter opens before us the gates of a thousand amusements, some of them good and some bad. One of my texts will show you that amusements may be destructive, my other text will show you that amusements may be under the divine blessing and direction.

There were 8,000 people assembled in the temple of Dagon. They had come to make sport of eyeless Samson. They were all ready for the entertainment. They began to clap and pound, impatient for the amusement to begin, and they cried, "Fetch him out! fetch him out!" Yonder I see the blind old giant coming, led by the hand of a child into the very midst of the temple. At his first appearance there goes up a shout of laughter and derision. The blind old giant pretends he is tired, and wants to rest himself against the pillars of the house; so he says to the lad who leads him, "Show me where the main pillars are." The lad does so. Then the strong man puts his right hand on one pillar and his left hand on another pillar, and, with the mightiest push that mortal they are offered you. Buy season tickets if you can, for the "Philharmonic," and the "Handel and Haydn" societies. Feel that the $1.50 or $2.00 that you spend for the purpose of hearing an artist play or sing is a profitable investment. Let your Steinway Halls and your Academies of Music roar with the acclamation of appreciative audiences assembled at the concert or the oratorio.

Still further: I commend as worthy of their support the gymnasium. This institution is gaining in favor every year, and I know of nothing more free from dissipation, or more calculated to recuperate the physical and mental energies. While there are a good many people who have employed this institution, there is a vast number who are ignorant of its excellencies. There are men with cramped chests and weak sides, and despondent spirits who, through the gymnasium, might be roused up to exuberance and exhilaration of life. There are many Christian people despondent from year to year who might, through such an institution, be benefitted in their spiritual relations. There are Christian people who seem to think that it is a good sign to be poorly; and because Richard Baxter and Robert Hall were invalids they think that by the same sickliness they may come to the same grandeur of character. I want to tell the Christian people of my congregation that God will hold you responsible for your invalidism if it is your fault, and when, through right exercise and prudence, you might be athletic and well. The effect of the body upon the soul you acknowledge. Put a man of mild disposition upon the animal diet of which the Indian partakes, and in a little while his blood will change its chemical proportions. It will become like unto the blood of the lion or tiger or the bear, while his disposition will change, and become fierce, cruel, and unrelenting. The body has a powerful effect upon the soul.

There are good people whose ideas of Heaven are all shut out with clouds of tobacco smoke. There are people who dare to shatter the physical vase in which God has put the jewel of eternity. There are men with great hearts and intellects in bodies worn out by their own neglects—magnificent machinery capable of propelling a Great Eastern across the Atlantic, yet fastened in a rickety North River protato, if you only realize it. Two hands. Two feet. You will have, perhaps, during the next year at least $10 for charitable contribution. You will have 2,500 cheerful looks, if you want to employ them. You will have 5,000 pleasant words, if you want to speak them. Now what an amount this is to start with!

You go out to-morrow morning, and you see a case of real destitution by the wayside. You give him 2 cents. The blind man hears the pennies rattle in his hat, and he says: "Thank you, sir; God bless you." You pass down the street, trying to look indifferent; but you feel from the very depth of your soul a profound satisfaction that you made that man happy. You go on still farther, and find a poor boy with a wheelbarrow, trying to get it up on the curbstone. He fails in the attempt. You say: "Stand back, my lad; let me try." You push it up on the curbstone for him and pass on. He wonders who that well-dressed man was that helped him. You did a great joy to your own soul. You will not get over it all the week.

Antiquity of Telegraphy.

A correspondent of the French journal, Cosmos, states that in a curious old work printed at Paris in 1622 there occurs a remarkable passage, in which the following is a translation: "We may also tell you of this great and wonderful secret, which a certain German has shown to King Henry, and who, by his industry and dexterity, is able to speak with those who are far away, and this by means of the magnet. He first rubs together two needle magnets, and then places them each separately upon two clock dials, around which are engraven the twenty-four letters of the alphabet. If, then, they wish to speak together, or make each other understood what they would desire, they move one hand around until it has pointed to the letters which are necessary to make the words and sentences that they would say, and as they turn one needle so also the distant needle turns, making always the same movement. HISTORICAL.

A double murder; John's decapitation, Herod's spiritual suicide. John and Herod are the two contrasted characters here. Herod Antipas, governor of Galilee and Peraea under Rome, a quarter-segment of the large domain of Herod the Great, his father; a weak, but ambitious man, easily led to iniquity, hardening his heart, like Pharaoh, against the truth, the same man who later suffered so severely at the hands of Aretas, his first father-in-law, and in the days of the feast with an added callousness, looked upon the basely-apprehended, cruelly-beaten Christ. On the other hand, John, stern, bold, fearless; appearing first an infant at the advent of Jesus; again a prophet at Christ's entrance upon his ministry; once more a strong, inquiring voice, though stifled in part in the midst of Christ's mighty works; now finally a martyr to the right, his work done, in Herod's dungeon. The days of his "decrease" are ended. In Christ is his "increase."

WHAT THE LESSON SAYS.

1. At that time. When Jesus was teaching in "his own country," near Nazareth of Galilee. Herod the Tetrarch. Herod Antipas, son of Herod the great, conceived in sin, his mother but one of the wives of that ruler, Malthake by name. It is the same Herod of Galilee to whom Pilate sent Christ at his subsequent apprehension. Tetrarch. Ruler of the fourth part, i. e., of his father's divided kingdom. Fame. The popular report. What every one was saying about Jesus.

2. Servants. Greek, "boys." His body-slaves

General and Political.

Sherman has a justice of the peace who nullifies the decisions of the Supreme Court. Great head!

Turkey has a new Minister of Finance. The duty of a Minister of Finance in Turkey is to "stand off" its creditors, not to provide means for paying them.

Gov. Luce has named Feb. 14 as the date for the special election in the eleventh congressional district to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the late Hon. Seth C. Moffatt, of Traverse City.

It is officially announced that if Russia shall provoke a war with Austria, Germany will come to the latter's support. Russia, being forewarned, will probably be in no hurry to provoke either of her neighbors.

The names of Mr. Perry Hannah and Judge Joseph H. Steere have have been widely mentioned in connection with the nomination of a candidate to fill the congressional vacancy in the eleventh District, caused by Mr. Moffatt's death.

The republican party is not confined to a one-man limit in the contest of 1888, while they have such men as Sherman, Lincoln, Gresham, Harrison, Hawley, Allison, Sheridan, and a host of others of a National reputation.

If Dakota were admitted into the Union it would be entitled to two United States senators, four members of the lower House and six Presidential electors, and all would be republican. That accounts for democratic opposition to its admission.

The president's jubilee gift to the Pope was a handsomely bound copy of the Constitution. When the president, representing the whole country, shows good judgment in these international amenities, we are with the president. The gift was in every way the thing to give.

Gen. Alger of Detroit, in giving clothing and fuel to hundreds of poor people on Christmas, added fresh luster to the good name he has won by repeated acts of generosity. If all men of great wealth had Alger hearts, this world would be a better place to live in than it sometimes to people who are hard pressed for the bare necessities of life.

Indianoplis Journal: Mr. Joseph Medill, of the Chicago Tribune, does not think the threatened tariff deluge will be much of a shower after all. He says: "The republican convention will not be held for six months yet, and by that time congress will settle the tariff question for some years at least." Yes, but matters of opinion sometimes weigh pretty heavy in politics, especially when they relate to great government politics.

The stock exchanges of Europe have been momentrily disturbed by false reports of the death of Emperor William. Such fluctuations in values are not based on sober thought, but on a temporary feeling of excitement of which speculators are quick to take advantage. The Emperor's death, when it occurs, will not prove as serious to Germany as the close of Prince Bismarck's career. The sovereign can be replaced, but the Chancellor can have no successor.

It is estimated that from 500 to 800 employes of the Reading road have lost their positions because they either refused to obey the company's orders or encouraged the strike. Wednesday afternoon 200 engineers, brakemen and firemen were paid off and dischared for the part they took in the strike. The Reading strike will surely be the beginning of the end of the Knights of Labor as a potential factor in directing the labor interests of the country, unless it shall be promptly and peremptory halted by the supreme authority of the order. The issue involves life or death to Mr. Powderly and his organization.

Particulars of Hon. Seth C. Moffatt's Sickness and Death.

* * * During the first of the week preceeding his death, he wrote his family that he was not feeling well, and subsequently complained of a boil on his chin. On Tuesday of that week he was in his seat as usual. The House adjourned that day until Thursday, at which time he was absent from his usual place, and his friend, Representative Wade, of Missouri, with some of the Michigan members, went to his hotel to see him. They found him suffering severely, but sitting up. Mr. Wade remained with him that night and the succeeding nights, until he was removed to the hospital.

On Friday and Saturday he was still very ill, but Sunday morning was better, and ate a hearty breakfast. His friends left him that morning feeling very much encouraged, but returning in the afternoon found a great change for the worse, the boil by this time had developed into a malignant carbuncle. On Monday morning it was proposed to Mr. Moffatt that he be removed to Providence hospital, and he, leaving the matter in the hands of his friends acquiesced to their wishes. He had been slightly delirious at intervals during Sunday night, and was not entirely himself, on Monday morning. Still he walked to the carriage, and on arriving at the hospital, walked up the steps and to his room, and undressed himself. An hour from that time he became unconscious, in which state he remained until his death. For several days his friend, Mr. Wade, had wished to send for Mrs. Moffatt, but Mr. Moffatt felt confident that he would be able to soon start for home, and after his removal to the hospital, his physician insisted that he was not in a dangerous condition and that it was unnecessary to send for his friends. Very strong feeling against this physician was expressed in Washington, as it was felt by Mr. Moffatt's friends that he should have known how critical the condition of the sick man was, and have allowed them to send for his family.

CLOSE CALL FOR MORRIS.

Brother Stockman Narrowly Escapes Being in a Kentucky Railroad Collision.

SOMMERVILLE, KY., Jan. 1, 1888.

To the Editor:

Our train into Cincinnati was late, and we did not catch the train we intended to go south on, which circumstance was very fortunate for us.

The train we missed collided with the north bound freight fourteen miles from this place. The conductor of the freight had orders to stop at Summit, but construed the order Sommerville. This was the cause of the collision.

So far as we are able to learn, there were six killed, and many more so badly injured that they will die. Very little can be learned from the railroad officials, and what we do learn is very conflicting. A gang of workmen are at the wreck removing the debris, but as the accident occurred in a deep cut, it will take a long time to remove it. In all probability we shall be compelled to remain here all day. The wounded are being cared for here.

Yours,
M. C. STOCKMAN

Michigan Law Against Gambling.

The following is the text of the law against gambling in the State of Michigan. A little careful study will perhaps induce some of our young men to pause and consider.

"If any person by playing at cards, dice, or any other game, or by betting or putting up money on cards or by any other means or devise in the nature of betting on cards, or betting of any kind, shall win or obtain any sum of money, or any article of value whatever, such person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction, if the money, goods or articles so won or obtained be of less value than twenty-five dollars, he shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding three months or by a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars or by both, such fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the court.

If the sum won amounts to $25 or more, then the penalty is one year in prison and $500 or both.

Every person who shall win or lose at any time or sitting, by gambing, or betting on the hands or sides of such as are gaming, any money or goods to the value of five dollars, or more, whether the same be paid over, or delivered or not, shall forfeit and pay three times the value of such money or goods."

"Any person who shall for hire, gain or reward, keep or maintain, a gaming room, or a gaming table, or any game of skill or chance or partly of skill and partly of chance, used for gaming, or who shall knowingly suffer a gaming room or gaming table, or any such game to be kept, maintained or played on any premises occupied or controlled by him, shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both.

"If any person shall make oath before any justice of the peace that he suspects, or has probable cause to suspect, that any house or other building is unlawfully used as and for a common gaming house, for the purpose of gaming for money or other property, and that idle and dissolute persons resort to the same for that purpose, such justice, whether the names of the persons last mentioned are known to the complainant or not, shall issue a warrant, commanding the sheriff or any constable to enter into such house or building and there to arrest all persons who shall be there found playing for money or otherwise, and also the keepers of the same, and to take into their costody all the implements of gaming there found, and to bring the said persons and implements of gaming there found, before such justice to be dealt with according to law."

There is more on the subject covering other forms of gambling, but the foregoing is sufficient to admonish those, old and young, who are conducting and engaging in gaming in this village, that they are out of jail to-day by the sufference of good people who have refrained thus far from making information against them, and there is also an admonition for owners of property wherein "blacklegs" resort and carry on their nefarious business. We have laid down the law and we trust there will henceforward be no occasion for producing the testimony.

CEDAR SHINGLES.

Enough Roof Covering in the Pine Lake Region to Shelter All Out Doors.

The fact is becoming an important one that a large proportion of our cedar is being converted into shingles. From the most authentic sources the SENTINEL has the statistics which will make the output of shingles in the Pine Lake region, including Norwood, Smithson's and Stanley's, for the winter of 87-8, and the coming season of navigation, reach fully 45,000,000. These figures are ascertainable from contracts made for next season's shipment. The increase in the manufacture of this product is this season attributable to the weak tie market, and the working up of the timber insures a fine quality.

Arthur Miller took the first prize for best county map. Nettie Waldron took the first in the B grade. The judges commended the whole work highly and it took good work to get the prize.

The Christmas tree on Saturday eve was apparently enjoyed by all present. The exercises were opened by Supt. Bird and some appropriate remarks by Pastor Dorrance, when the program prepared by the S. S. pupils was presented. Cassie Box in her recitation "Santa Claus Wife" put those present in excellent humor, and a class of little folks under charge of Miss Lennox in a concert recitation and song, called fourth applause again as did all the children's part in the program. The tree and wreath in front as well as a table was loaded with presents ranging from candy and peanuts, to a gold watch and chain, received by Miss Nelle Noyes from her brothers. Supt. Bird received an elegant walking stick from the S.S. which he flourishes much more gracefully than he does his old crooked maple stick. Miss Lennox, Pres. of the H. H. society, received a gold pen and pen holder from the gentlemen of the society. The S. S. remembered Miss Noyes, the organist, with a similar gift, and when it was proclaimed that old Santa had jumped out of a new suit of clothes and left them labelled for Charlie Copeland, it was in truth a Merry Christmas to all, and none more than Charlie. We cannot mention all that recived costly gifts for the editor would "scissor" us, but in closing would notice that the Gram. Dept. High School, and Bible Class each remembered J. M. Harris with appropriate and handsome presents.

Bellaire Breeze: "The dedication of the M. E. church of Bellaire, on Christmas day, was a grand success. Right royally did the people respond to the call. The debt was greater than we anticipated, yet the friends were determined the amount should be raised. The amount asked for at the dedication was $400; amount pledged, $464; which, with other subscriptions, shows that since the 15th of September, 1887, the amount contributed by the Bellaire people is $755.

Kalamazoo Telegraph: Ben Davis of the Elk Rapids Progress, is determined to throw himself away. He announces that he wants to correspond with a young lady worth about $50,000 with a view of matrimony. He is not after the money, but he wants some tender, loving heart to care for him in sickness, and look after things generally. Mr. Davis is one of the best-looking young men in a region notorious for its good-looking men, and in the line of "fish stories" is all that a dotting and confiding companion could desire.

The monster drawbridge of the international baidge across the Sault canal and Sault river was first swung into position last week Tuesday, by hand power, at 4 P. M., and again Wednesday forenoon. It is working perfectly. The grading south of the draw was completed Wednesday to the railroad yards, and the track laid within 48 hours. The track has been laid on the Canadian approach to within 200 feet of the bridge, and reached the bridge the 30th. The Canadian Sault voted $22,000 bonus Tuesday to the Canadian Pacific on condition that they, the company, locate their shops in the centre of the town.

Cadillac special of the 30th: Last night was an eventful one for Cadillac's citizens as well as the strangers within the gates. When the excursion train arrived there at 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon, Mr. Ashley led the way to the McKinnon house, where the visitors proceeded to surprise the landlord by the quantity of food they were able to dispose of. In the evening most of the prominent citizens visited the hotel and paid their respects to the city's guests, and many remained to help them while away the evening with conversation. On the train a vote was taken on the question of local option, which stood, affirmative, 42; negative, 50; non committal, 18. On the choice of president for 1889 the vote stood, Blaine, 40; Cleveland, 38; Lincoln, 10; and among the numerous scattering votes one struck the great financier, John Sherman.

—Chas. Swallow and Levi Lamphear left Sunday for Tallaposa, Ga., to remain the balance of the winter, they have a painting job there.

—C. H. Ball and wife arrived at the Aldrich residence Saturday from their wedding tour. They leave this week for their future home in Marquette.

The finest sign in town has just been erected by Geo. W. Miller. It is the work of Heath as contractor, and Swallow as painter. It is a dandy.

The invoice of the Dr. Cronter stock is made preparatory to its transfer to Mr. Beaman. That will bring a practical knowledge of pharmacy into the business.

—If the voters of Charlevoix county are inclined to right a wrong, and do a good thing, a just thing, a sensible thing, they will make Capt. Harrison Berdan Sheriff next fall.

—Coal is retailing at $25 per ton at Pasadena, Cal., where Dr. Cronter and wife are sojourning. At that rate it takes a number of tons of grapes to get an even trade for a ton of coal.

Under the head of "local news" we clip the following from the East Jordan Enterprise: "The London Times celebrated its hundredth year of publication last week.——It is said that for every missionary sent to Africa 70,000 gallons of rum are shipped to the "dark continent."

—Frank Hines, always alive to new ideas, has erected a fine new sign in front of his store, attached to which is an expensive thermometer, below which is exposed to the public on a bulletin, the temperature every hour of the day. Heath made the woodwork of the sign and Swallow did the gilt lettering.

Albert Boston at Smithson's camp, telephones us the following item, and swears by the beard of the Prophet that it is true: One cedar tree worked up into ties as follows: 1st cut, 10 ties; 2d, 9; 3d, 8; 4th, 6; 5th, 4. When Albert tried to cram four posts and one cord of bolts down our neck besides, we "rung off." But they do say it is true, nevertheless.

—Mr. Cherrie's contemplated visit to New York has been necessarily delayed by business, but he is there now, and has with him the maps and profiles of the railroad route, and there is very little doubt that he will perfect arrangements whereby active operations will soon be commenced. Engineer Beardslee so states, and as that gentleman is being kept here for the purpose of superintending the work, it looks very much like business.

—It is ex-Sheriff Jerrue now. Dan has gone to other parts never to return—we hope. Jerrue's incumbency of the office of Sheriff was a sad illustration of political possibility—a pregnant example of depravity in man as well as in politics. The fact of the business is, Charlevoix county made a great big monumental fool of itself when it elected D. B. Jerrue Sheriff. He was as Sheriff, a creature of circumstances—a political abortion. He played for the office just as he played at poker—to win. He stopped at nothing—scrupled at nothing. He spent more money to be elected than he would have received from the county had he served out his term, and what augmented the influence of his money was his ability to appear what he was not—a gentleman. As Sheriff he never did anything to prove that he was fit for the office, but did many things to demonstrate his total unfitness. Only two good acts characterized his administration; one was the appointment of a decent man as Under-Sheriff, and the other was his resignation. This is the man who defeated Captain Harrison Berdan, who had filled the office two years with ability and fidelity; an upright citizen, a brave old trooper of Gettysburg, the Wilderness, Stone River, who led his company into the jaws of death on many a bloody field. If there is a citizen of Charlevoix county who voted for Daniel B. Jerrue against Harrison Berdan and is not ashamed of it, we would like to have him show his face. We speak plainly, but it is not because the Rocky Mountains are between Mr. Jerrue and the SENTINEL. The gentleman was conversant with our opinion of him before he left the county. He is the caput mortuum of a most disgraceful episode in the political history of Charlevoix county. Vale Jerrue!

SALOONS MUST GO!

St. Valentine's Day Selected for the Vote on Local Option in This County.

County Clerk Thatcher has designated Tuesday, the 14th day of February as the date of a special election upon the question of local prohibition.

There can be no question as to the result. The saloons must go. In this movement temperance people make no war upon individuals, but upon an evil, the equal of which does not exist upon the broad earth. Its devastating effects are everywhere apparent; its blighting influence everywhere felt.

It will need no argument, no temperance literature nor electioneering at the polls to drive whisky to the wall in Charlevoix county. We believe it will be swept away as before a tidal wave. The temperance vote would carry it, but to these will be added the ballots of scores of moderate and immoderate drinkers who realize their situation, and want the temptation removed.

For the sake of these; for the sake of their families; for the sake of society; for the sake of our boys and young men; for the sake of public economy, let us throttle the viper.

Let the people of Charlevoix county stamp out the saloons, and then pay their compliments to the next greatest evil—the gambling dens.

Society Notes.

Roy Washburn entertained his young friends on Wednesday evening.

Lillie Carpenter took possession of the parental domicil on Thursday evening, and a fine gathering of little misses made the evening an enjoyable one.

Bertie Fox celebrated his 16th birthday on the evening of the 2nd, by a party to his young friends of both sexes. The Fox mansion was given up to the lads and lasses, and lots of fun is reported.

The friends of Rev. James Inwood—which embrases all of Charlevoix—surprised him on the occasion of his 78th birthday, Wednesday afternoon, and a very large number paid their respects to the old gentleman.

Mrs. Fox gave a pedro party Friday evening, and a most enjoyable evening was spent by those present.

Master Ralph Washburn entertained his young friends Saturday evening last at the parental mansion.

Mrs. E. Carpenter's home was enlivened Thursday evening last by a social gathering of friends.

Both Will and Ida were formerly compositors in the HERALD office, and good ones, too. The entire office join in heartiest congratulations and best wishes, and many friends in Traverse will do the same. Mr. and Mrs. Aldrich will reside in Chicago, where Mr. Aldrich has a position on the Inter-Ocean.

The following item from a Wisconsin paper, will be of interest in this region: Leathem & Smith, of Sturgeon Bay, have purchased of W. H. Horn the peninsula telegraph line running from Horn's Pier to Bailey's Harbor. Mr. Horn will remove that portion of the line running to Whitefish Bay and to Horn's Pier, and the new proprietors will run the wire to Lily Bay and replace the telegraph instruments with telephones, giving them a direct communication with Jacksonport and Bailey's Harbor by telephone. It is said that Leathem & Smith will also put in a private telegraph line to Marinette. It is their intention to use the two lines in connection with their tug business. Leathem & Smith are well known here, having done considerable wrecking in this vicinity.

General and Political

Sherman has a justice of the peace who nullifies the decisions of the Supreme Court. Great head!

Turkey has a new Minister of Finance. The duty of a Minister of Finance in Turkey is to "stand off" its creditors, not to provide means for paying them.

Gov. Luce has named Feb. 14 as the date for the special election in the eleventh congressional district to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the late Hon. Seth C. Moffatt, of Traverse City.

It is officially announced that if Russia shall provoke a war with Austria, Germany will come to the latter's support. Russia, being forewarned, will probably be in no hurry to provoke either of her neighbors.

The names of Mr Perry Hannah and Judge Joseph H. Steere have have been widely mentioned in connection with the nomination of a candidate to fill the congressional vacancy in the eleventh District, caused by Mr Moffatt's death.

The republican party is not confined to a one man limit in the contest of 1888, while they have such men as Sherman, Lincoln, Gresham, Harrison, Hawley, Allison, Sheridan, and a host of others of a National reputation.

If Dakota were admitted into the Union it would be entitled to two United States senators, four members of the lower House and six Presidential electors, and all would be republican. That accounts for democratic opposition to its admission.

The president's jubilee gift to the Pope was a handsomely bound copy of the Constitution. When the president, representing the whole country shows good judgment in these international amenities, we are with the president. The gift was in every way the thing to give.

Gen Alger of Detroit, in giving clothing and fuel to hundreds of poor people on Christmas, added fresh luster to the good name he has won by repeated acts of generosity. If all men of great wealth had Alger hearts, this world would be a better place to live in than it sometimes to people who are hard pressed for the bare necessities of life.

Indianapolis Journal: Mr. Joseph Medill, of the Chicago Tribune, does not think the threatened tariff deluge will be much of a shower after all. He says: "The republican convention will not be held for six months yet, and by that time congress will settle the tariff question for some years at least." Yes, but matters of opinion sometimes weigh pretty heavy in politics, especially when they relate to great government policies.

The stock exchanges of Europe have been momentarily disturbed by false reports of the death of Emperor William. Such fluctuations in values are not based on sober thought, but on a temporary feeling of excitement of which speculators are quick to take advantage. The Emperor's death, when it occurs, will not prove as serious to Germany as the close of Prince Bismarck's career. The sovereign can be replaced, but the Chancellor can have no successor.

It is estimated that from 500 to 800 employes of the Reading road have lost their positions because they either refused to obey the company's orders or encouraged the strike. Wednesday afternoon 200 engineers, brakemen and firemen were paid off and discharged for the part they took in the strike. The Reading strike will surely be the beginning of the end of the Knights of Labor as a potential factor in directing the labor interests of the country, unless it shall be promptly and peremptory baffled by the supreme authority of the order. The issue involves life or death to Mr. Powderly and his organization.

Particulars of Hon Seth C. Moffatt's Sickness and Death.

* * * During the first of the week preceeding his death, he wrote his family that he was not feeling well, and subsequently complained of a boil on his chin. On Tuesday of that week he was in his seat as usual. The House adjourned that day until Thursday, at which time he was absent from his usual place, and his friend, Representative Wade, of Missouri, with some of the Michigan members, went to his hotel to see him. They found him suffering severely, but sitting up. Mr. Wade remained with him that night and the succeeding nights, until he was removed to the hospital.

On Friday and Saturday he was still very ill, but Sunday morning was better, and ate a hearty breakfast. His friends left him that morning feeling very much encouraged, but returning in the afternoon found a great change for the worse, the boil by this time had developed into a malignant carbuncle. On Monday morning it was proposed to Mr. Moffatt that he be removed to Providence hospital, and he, leaving the matter in the hands of his friends acquiesced to their wishes. He had been slightly delirious at intervals during Sunday night, and was not entirely himself, on Monday morning. Still he walked to the carriage, and on arriving at the hospital, walked up the steps and to his room, and undressed himself. An hour from that time he became unconscious, in which state he remained until his death. For several days his friend, Mr. Wade, had wished to send for Mrs. Moffatt, but Mr. Moffatt felt confident that he would be able to soon start for home, and after his removal to the hospital, his physician insisted that he was not in a dangerous condition and that it was unnecessary to send for his friends. Very strong feeling against this physician was expressed in Washington, as it was felt by Mr. Moffatt's friends that he should have known how critical the condition of the sick man was, and have allowed them to send for his family.

CLOSE CALL FOR MORRIS.

Brother Stockman Narrowly Escapes Being in a Kentucky Railroad Collision

SOMMERVILLE, KY., JAN 1, 1888.

To the Editor:

Our train into [illegible] was late, [illegible] the train we [illegible] which [illegible] was very fortunate for us.

The train we passed collided with the north-bound freight fourteen miles from this place. The conductor of the freight had orders to stop at Summit, but construed the order Sommerville. This was the cause of the collision.

So far as we are able to learn, there were six killed, and many more so badly injured that they will die. Very little can be learned from the railroad officials, and what we do learn is very conflicting. A gang of workmen are at the wreck removing the debris, but as the accident occurred in a deep cut, it will take a long time to remove it. In all probability we shall be compelled to remain here all day. The wounded are being cared for here.

Yours,

M. J. STOCKMAN

Michigan Law Against Gambling.

The following is the text of the law against gambling in the State of Michigan. A little careful study will perhaps induce some of our young men to pause and consider.

"If any person by playing at cards, dice, or any other game, or by betting or putting up money on cards or by any other means or devise in the nature of betting on cards, or betting of any kind, shall win or obtain any sum of money, or any article of value whatever, such person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction, if the money, goods or articles so won or obtained be of less value than twenty five dollars, he shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding three months or by a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars or by both, such fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the court.

If the sum won amounts to $25 or more, then the penalty is one year in prison and $500 or both.

Every person who shall win or lose at any time or sitting, by gaming, or betting on the hands or sides of such as are gaming, any money or goods to the value of five dollars, or more, whether the same be paid over, or delivered or not, shall forfeit and pay three times the value of such money or goods."

"Any person who shall for hire, gain or reward, keep or maintain, a gaming room, or a gaming table, or any game of skill or chance or partly of skill and partly of chance, used for gaming, or who shall knowingly suffer a gaming room or gaming table, or any such game to be kept, maintained or played on any premises occupied or controlled by him, shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both.

"If any person shall make oath before any justice of the peace that he suspects, or has probable cause to suspect, that any house or other building is unlawfully used as and for a common gaming house, for the purpose of gaming for money or other property, and that idle and dissolute persons resort to the same for that purpose, such justice, whether the names of the persons last mentioned are known to the complainant or not, shall issue a warrant, commanding the sheriff or any constable to enter into such house or building and there to arrest all persons who shall be there found playing for money or otherwise, and also the keepers of the same, and to take into their custody all the implements of gaming there found, and to bring the said persons and implements of gaming there found, before such justice to be dealt with according to law."

There is more on the subject covering other forms of gambling, but the foregoing is sufficient to admonish those, old and young, who are conducting and engaging in gaming in this village, that they are out of jail to day by the sufferance of good people who have refrained thus far from making information against them, and there is also an admonition for owners of property wherein "blacklegs" resort and carry on their nefarious business. We have laid down the law and we trust there will henceforward be no occasion for producing the testimony.

Enough Roof Covering in the Pine Lake Region to Shelter All Out Doors

The [illegible] large [illegible] of our [illegible] Pine Lake region, including [illegible] and Sandby's, for the winter of '87-'8, and the coming season of navigation, reach fully 25,000,000. These figures are ascertainable from contracts made for next season's shipment. The increase in the manufacture of this product is this season attributable to the weak tie market, and the working up of the timber insures a fine quality.

All our people seemed to have a Merry Christmas.

The ferry was in operation on Xmas. A consolation for the open winter prophets.

Arthur Miller took the first prize for best county map. Nettie Waldron took the first in the B grade. The judges commended the whole work highly and it took good work to get the prize.

The Christmas tree on Saturday eve was apparently enjoyed by all present. The exercises were opened by Supt. Bird and some appropriate remarks by Pastor Dorrance, when the program prepared by the S. S. pupils was presented. Cassie Box in her recitation "Santa Claus Wife" put those present in excellent humor, and a class of little folks under charge of Miss Lennox in a concert recitation and song, called fourth applause again as did all the children's part in the program. The tree and wreath in front as well as a table was loaded with presents ranging from candy and peanuts, to a gold watch and chain, received by Miss Nellie Noyes from her brothers. Supt. Bird received an elegant walking stick from the S. S. which he flourishes much more gracefully than he does his old crooked maple-stick. Miss Lennox, Pres. of the H. H. society, received a gold pen and pen holder from the gentlemen of the society. The S. S. remembered Miss Noyes, the organist, with a similar gift, and when it was proclaimed that old Santa had jumped out of a new suit of clothes and left them labelled for Charlie Copeland, it was in truth a Merry Christmas to all, and none more than Charlie. We cannot mention all that received costly gifts for the editor would "scissor" us, but in closing would notice that the Grain Dept., High School, and Bible Class each remembered J. M. Harris with appropriate and handsome presents.

Bellaire Breeze: "The dedication of the M. E. church of Bellaire, on Christmas day, was a grand success. Right royally did the people respond to the call. The debt was greater than we anticipated, yet the friends were determined the amount should be raised. The amount asked for at the dedication was $400; amount pledged, $461; which, with other subscriptions, shows that since the 15th of September, 1887, the amount contributed by the Bellaire people is $755.

Kalamazoo Telegraph: Ben Davis of the Elk Rapids Progress, is determined to throw himself away. Mr. Davis is one of the best-looking young men in a region notorious for its good looking men, and in the line of "fish stories" is all that a doting and confiding companion could desire.

The monster drawbridge of the international bridge across the Sault canal and Sault river was first swung into position last week Tuesday, by hand power, at 4 P. M., and again Wednesday forenoon. It is working perfectly. The grading south of the draw was completed Wednesday to the railroad yards, and the track laid within 48 hours. The track has been laid on the Canadian approach to within 200 feet of the bridge, and reached the bridge the 30th. The Canadian Sault voted $22,000 bonus Tuesday to the Canadian Pacific on condition that they, the company, locate their shops in the centre of the town.

Cadillac special of the 30th: Last night was an eventful one for Cadillac's citizens as well as the strangers within the gates. When the excursion train arrived there at 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon Mr. Ashley led the way to the McKinnon house, where the visitors proceeded to surprise the landlord by the quantity of food they were able to dispose of. In the evening most of the prominent citizens visited the hotel and paid their respects to the city's guests, and many remained to help them while away the evening with conversation. On the train a vote was taken on the question of local option, which stood, affirmative, 42; negative, 50; non committal, 18. On the choice of president for 1889 the vote stood, Blaine, 49; Cleveland, 33; Lincoln, 10; and among the numerous scattering votes one struck the great financier, John Sherman.

Mr. E. W. Fuller, well known in Charlevoix, was married on Saturday evening to Mrs. Ellen Hosley, of Petoskey, the ceremony being preformed at the Bridge Street House by Rev. W. H. Mc. Cartney. Mr. and Mrs. Fuller will make the Globe hotel, Alpena, their home for a portion of the winter, and will make their home in Texas later, where Mrs. F. has a fine stock ranch which needs looking after, and which will occupy most of the time of "Fanning-Mill Fuller."

—In another column is an open letter from Wm. Black, to the Agricultural Society Directors, embodying his resignation as President of the Society. Mr. Black is one of the best known and most highly respected citizens of the county, and there will be much genuine regret at the unfortunate circumstances which render it necessary for him to retire from further active participation in public affairs in our county. No man in Charlevoix county is more eminently fitted for the office which he resigns than Wm. Black.

—The finest sign in town has just been erected by Geo. W. Miller. It is the work of Heath as contractor, and Swallow as painter. It is a dandy.

The invoice of the Dr. Crouter stock is made preparatory to its transfer to Mr. Beaman. That will bring a practical knowledge of pharmacy into the business.

If the voters of Charlevoix county are inclined to right a wrong, and do a good thing, a just thing, a sensible thing, they will make Capt. Harrison Berdan Sheriff next fall.

—Coal is retailing at $25 per ton at Pasadena, Cal., where Dr. Crouter and wife are sojourning. At that rate it takes a number of tons of grapes to get an even trade for a ton of coal.

Under the head of "local news" we clip the following from the East Jordan Enterprise: "The London Times celebrated its hundredth year of publication last week.—— It is said that for every missionary sent to Africa 70,000 gallons of rum are shipped to the 'dark continent.'"

Frank Hines, always alive to new ideas, has erected a fine new sign in front of his store, attached to which is an expensive thermometer, below which is exposed to the public on a bulletin, the temperature every hour of the day. Heath made the wood work of the sign and Swallow did the gilt lettering.

—Albert Boston at Smithson's camp, telephones us the following item, and swears by the beard of the Prophet that it is true: One cedar tree worked up into ties as follows: 1st cut, 10 ties; 2d, 9; 3d, 8; 4th, 6; 5th, 1. When Albert tried to cram four posts and one cord of bolts down our neck besides, we "rang off." But they do say it is true, nevertheless.

—Mr. Cherrie's contemplated visit to New York has been necessarily delayed by business, but he is there now, and has with him the maps and profiles of the railroad route, and there is very little doubt that he will perfect arrangements whereby active operations will soon be commenced. Engineer Beardslee so states, and as that gentleman is being kept here for the purpose of superintending the work, it looks very much like business.

—It is ex-Sheriff Jerrue now. Dan has gone to other parts never to return we hope. Jerrue's incumbency of the office of Sheriff was a sad illustration of political possibility—a pregnant example of depravity in man as well as in politics. The fact of the business is, Charlevoix county made a great big monumental fool of itself when it elected D. B. Jerrue Sheriff. He was as Sheriff, a creature of circumstances—a political abortion. He played for the office just as he played at poker—to win. He stopped at nothing—scrupled at nothing. He spent more money to be elected than he would have received from the county had he served out his term, and what augmented the influence of his money was his ability to appear what he was not—a gentleman. As Sheriff he never did anything to prove that he was fit for the office, but did many things to demonstrate his total unfitness. Only two good acts characterized his administration; one was the appointment of a decent man as Under-Sheriff, and the other was his resignation. This is the man who defeated Captain Harrison Berdan, who had filled the office two years with ability and fidelity; an upright citizen, a brave old trooper of Gettysburg, the Wilderness, Stone River, who led his company into the jaws of death on many a bloody field. If there is a citizen of Charlevoix county who voted for Daniel B. Jerrue against Harrison Berdan and is not ashamed of it, we would like to have him show his face. We speak plainly, but it is not because the Rocky Mountains are between Mr. Jerrue and the SENTINEL. The gentleman was conversant with our opinion of him before he left the county. He is the caput mortuum of a most disgraceful episode in the political history of Charlevoix county. Vale Jerrue!

SALOONS MUST GO!

St. Valentine's Day Selected for the Vote on Local Option in This County.

County Clerk Thatcher has designated Tuesday, the 14th day of February as the date of a special election upon the question of local prohibition.

There can be no question as to the result. The saloons must go. In this movement temperance people make no war upon individuals, but upon an evil, the equal of which does not exist upon the broad earth. Its devastating effects are everywhere apparent; its blighting influence everywhere felt.

It will need no argument, no temperance literature nor electioneering at the polls to drive whisky to the wall in Charlevoix county. We believe it will be swept away as before a tidal wave. The temperance vote would carry it, but to these will be added the ballots of scores of moderate and immoderate drinkers who realize their situation, and want the temptation removed.

For the sake of these; for the sake of their families; for the sake of society; for the sake of our boys and young men; for the sake of public economy, let us throttle the viper.

Let the people of Charlevoix county stamp out the saloons, and then pay their compliments to the next greatest evil—the gambling dens.

The following item from a Wisconsin paper, will be of interest in this region: Leathem & Smith, of Sturgeon Bay, have purchased of W. H. Horn the peninsula telegraph line running from Horn's Pier to Bailey's Harbor. Mr. Horn will remove that portion of the line running to Whitefish Bay and to Horn's Pier, and the new proprietors will run the wire to Lily Bay and replace the telegraph instruments with telephones, giving them a direct communication with Jacksonport and Bailey's Harbor by telephone. It is said that Leathem & Smith will also put in a private telegraph line to Marinette. It is their intention to use the two lines in connection with their tug business. Leathem & Smith are well known here, having done considerable wrecking in this vicinity.

A Woman's View.

How calmly men speak of war, of battle,
Of the possible loss of a thousand lives.
Ah! but to women the
cannon's rattle
Tells of mourning sisters and wives;

Of brave boys marching out in the morning,
And lying with up turned brows at night
Of the swift death angel, with brief, sharp
warning,
Scattering broadcast ruin and blight;

Of maidens watching, waiting, and weeping
For lovers who never will come again;
Of sisters longing for boys who are sleeping
In coffinless graves on the battle plain;

Of the dread suspense and the awful anguish
That from first to last is a woman's lot;
Of loathsome prisons where dear one's languish;
Of sleepless nights, and days all fraught

With wild conjectures and mighty sorrow;
With weeping, and wailing, and hope deferred,
With hating the present and dreading the morrow,
And oft repeating, "What news have you heard?"

Of a cast-off garment, prized as a treasure,
Because a dear one has worn it of late,
Of rivers of tears, and grief without measure,
Of houses and homes made desolate.

Yes, this is the meaning of war to woman;
Not brave, heroic, nor strong, I know;
Weak, no doubt; but she is so human,
And the old-time Spartans died long ago.

... our success. It is not often that a capture of this kind is effected without loss of life; but such is the fortune of war.—Chicago Ledger.

"Canned Peaches."

I suppose most of the comrades have a vivid remembrance of the average soldier's hankering after a taste of spirituous liquors, or "commissary," as the boys called it, writes Crowell in the National Tribune. It was my observation that although while a citizen at home he was usually temperate and law-abiding, yet as a soldier no laws, no orders, and no persuasion would prevent his risking a tour in "barrel armour," a trick in the guard-house, or even his life, to obtain some "commissary," he holding it to be self-evident that he should have as much of it to drink as his commanding officer, provided he could carry it, and he never had any doubt of his ability to do so. Too often the officer claimed the exclusive privilege of drinking all the "commissary," and then the consequences to the private soldier going under fire were exceedingly disastrous.

I knew a Major of infantry who was a thoroughly drilled officer in tactics and regulations, who never could bring his body to face the enemy in time of battle without having his skin full of whisky, and then his regiment fared badly. But a time came when, suddenly thrown into battle, he couldn't get a drop, and he didn't go. Instead of obeying orders, he dismounted and sneaked away to the rear to get behind a stump, and the ranking Captain, hearing the orders, instantly mounted the Major's horse, and away went the regiment with the rest of the line of battle, driving all before them, capturing two guns of a Confederate battery in its front, and redeeming itself from criticisms on its previous conduct under a drunken Major, who never commanded that regiment any more, but departed to a camp where ...

... years—should be required absolutely to give at least three years of his time to a regular military training, so that when these interruptions come we may be a nation of trained soldiers."

Had the great rank and file of the Confederacy heard that proposition early in the war it would have speedily ended; but, as remarked by the gentleman who related the above, having gotten into the trouble and been in it for nearly two years they were willing to stay until its close, hoping against hope that it would not only end speedily, but end as their chosen leader had predicted.

My Rackensack and His Spurs.

A SCOUTING party of sixteen of us had captured twenty-seven of the enemy and thirty-two horses. We were told that General Forrest was at Olive Branch with four thousand cavalry, only a mile distant. To get back to Baton Rouge, a distance of twenty-two miles, we must pass them. We recrossed the bridge, rode down the river a mile, forded it, and intended to make the Comite ford before the enemy were aroused in camp. Here a little incident occurred to me, which, though it is well enough to laugh about now, failed to excite the spirit of mirth in me at that time.

One of the prisoners whom I was guarding, was a tall, swarthy fellow. He called himself "A Rackensack from Arkansas." He wore a pair of silver-plated Mexican spurs which I wanted, and accordingly politely asked him to present them to me as a mark of respect to his superior officer.

He "allowed" he would keep them, and after a few complimentary words passed between us, I finally gave him to understand that he was my prisoner, and I would have the spurs if it cost ...

EDUCATION IN SWITZERLAND.

Practical System of Teaching Boys Foreign Languages.

[Cornhill Magazine.]

The people of Emsonan are Catholic, and use the Romanisch language. In its purest form, as spoken by the natives of the Vorder Rheinthal, Romanisch or Ladinisch is a well-preserved dialect of rustic Latin. In the Rhine Valley, where Emsonan is situated, it has, however, been largely adulterated with German, while in the Engadine it tends more and more to assimilation with Italian. There are several varieties of the dialect to be found in isolated valleys of the Grisons, all of them testifying to the long occupation of this Rhaetic province by the Romans. The Romanisch population speak with pride of their tongue as the key of languages. There is truth in this boast; for Rumanisch exhibits a remarkable richness of vowel sounds, which enables those who use it to catch with ease the accent of other races, while its vocabulary has much in common with French, Italian, and Spanish. In the schools German is taught, and sermons are occasionally preached in that language for the benefit of resident aliens.

The inhabitants of Graubunden speak, for the most part, German; about 30,000 speak Romanisch; and a smaller section, belonging to the valleys of Mesocco, Bregaglia and Poschiavo, use Italian. Now the same education is given in all districts; and among the Italian Graubundeners there are both Protestant and Catholic villages. It is therefore a frequent custom for German families to send one or two of their sons during the winter into an Italian family, receiving an equal number of Italian children in return. The Drum Major.

Do you, my dear sir, who read this fancy that you could be a drum major? Can you fancy anything more exquisitely foolish than you would look in that dress? No. Preposterous as our conceit is in most directions, we know that a limit is set to all human achievement. You could no more march in review for miles before thousands of people and flourish your rattan in their faces with the debonair grace or easy insolence of a drum major than you could fly. You would certainly suck it, and probably drop it, and possibly run somebody through with it. You would look positively purple in your hideous embarrassment, and sigh for an earthquake to swallow you or the spectators up as you shambled awkwardly along in utter wretchedness, but, unlike Alice Ben Bolt of ballad fame, you would not make the multitude weep with delight by your smile or tremble with fear at your frown, and not for all the gold of Arabia and the gems of Samarcand would you put yourself in such a position. Have you, par hasard, has anybody, ever seen a dead drum major? Can you lay your hands on a living one? What is he like in private life? Is he as good as he is great? Has he any occupation except "to exist beautifully," a dwelling-place, associates?

How Exploring is Done.

Sometimes the advent of exploring parties inflicts much suffering which the visitors are not responsible for and cannot prevent. The Stanley expedition has just furnished a case in point. When Stanley and nearly four hundred of his men reached Yambuga rapids in the Aruwimi River all the inhabitants of the large villages in the neighborhood fled into the forests leaving hundreds of huts without a tenant, and abandoning their gardens and fields to the intruders. Their precipitate flight could not be prevented, though without doubt it brought great suffering upon them. Stanley was willing to pay for food, but as the owners of the fields fled he had no other course than to take from the fields such supplies as he needed without paying for them. A few of the fugitives were caught and dismissed with presents, and Stanley hoped that in this way the men he left in charge at this place would gradually win the confidence of the natives and induce them to return to their homes.

The late Sir Peter Scratchley, formerly the British Commissioner in New Guinea, investigated some time ago a number of cases in which white men had been murdered by the savages of that big island. He reported that in every instance he found that the white men were the aggressors. They had tried to kidnap natives, had wantonly killed some of them, or in other ways had inflicted bitter wrongs upon them. Though in all cases he considered it his duty to give the natives to understand that they must leave to the whites the punishment of men who injured them, he said that some of these men richly deserved their tragic fate. There is one white man, the Rev. Mr. Chalmers, who goes in and out among these same natives with perfect fearlessness. He never carries a weapon of any sort, but he has inspired the natives along ...

Hunting a Kangaroo.

I began to work him to the front, with the music of the pack ringing, pealing, rising in ecstasy, and the trees shooting backward as if on wings; past Wallerton, Glentworth, and Cameron, over a flight of rails and into an open where the hounds were tumbling over the two smaller kangaroo. The old man, meanwhile, head erect, leaping, bounding away, covering at least eighteen feet at a jump, was gaining a good lead. I passed the hounds at full speed with a cheer, and they, leaving the dead, sprung on in chase of the living, their throats wetted with their kill and eager for the nobler game; so eager, indeed, that they outstripped me, although my horse was running as if in a finish. A short distance ahead I saw the dark line of a dried watercourse. At this the old man went, and with a gigantic bound cleared it and leaped on undaunted. At it went the hounds—some over, some in-and out. As my turn came I steadied my horse and sent him at it with a shout. He rose clear, and in a second's flash I saw the rocky bottom far below me. We struck with a slide in front, a scramble behind, and a stumbling recovery, but safely over; and as I threw myself back in the saddle I saw the old man standing high against a gum-tree at bay—or, as the Australians have it, "stuck up."

I sat down and set my horse going, congratulating myself on being alone at the death, when Glentworth shot past me with the immovable seat that had ever characterized his dreaded run in, and dismounting billy in hand, made his way through the dogs and stood before the kangaroo. I followed his example, and for the first time enjoyed a struggle with a "game old man." He stood with his back pressed against the tree, his head up, and his eyes gleaming; he kept his short forelegs moving ...

Two new machines of some importance in writing and speaking are about to come before the public. One is the graphophone, a machine which serves as an amanuensis. A corporation for its manufacture has been organized under the laws of West Virginia, which are designed to please corporators and give revenue to the State. Gardiner G. Hubbard is one of the directors. A still more important perfection recently attained is that of Prof. Elisha Gray's "telautograph," a telegraphic apparatus which transmits the handwriting or any other picture tracing upon paper any distance. This will be highly valued by business men and bankers. The valuable feature of the invention is the plate on which is laid the paper written on by the sender. A pencil or any sharp object may be used to write with, and the receiving machine traces the message with a pencil or anything capable of marking, reproducing the form of the message precisely. Thus the sending operator will merely write the message on paper, and when he has finished it will have ...

Charlevoix Sentinel.

Established, 1869.

WILLARD A. SMITH, EDITOR.

CHARLEVOIX, JAN. 11, 1888.

Philadelphia Telegraph: The name of Lincoln must not be allowed to be idle in such a contest as that of next year.

That Pennsylvania bull that tried to butt the locomotive off the track the other day must have got a copy of the President's message mixed up in his feed. The symptoms are the same.

New York Press: If these is any one thing that should unite the loyal sentiment of the country against the attempt to put upon the Supreme Bench a man notoriously unfit for the place—a man who refuses to acknowledge the validity of the constitution—it is the threatening and swaggering attitude now assumed by Lamar's Southern friends and their Northern allies.

New York Mail and Express: The Republican party is the American party. It is the party that has done most to preserve the best traditions and to establish the best policies of "the Fathers." It is the party whose American principles would receive the benediction and approval of James Madison, if he could be permitted to us and communicate his views.

Boston Journal: The Republican party stands for certain great principles which may well command the loyalty of young men. It holds to a genuine reform of the civil service. It stands for a treatment of the tariff along the lines of protection to American manufactures and American labor. It insists upon a fair ballot and a fair count, North and South. It antagonizes the dominance of the saloon power and offers the most effective political agency for restraining it. Upon these and other issues it appeals confidently to young men, who, as they come of age and consider what party associations they shall form, will naturally be drawn toward the party which stands for the right side of current issues.

Milwaukee Wisconsin.

The Milwaukee Sentinel has been devoting much valuable space lately to the agreeable task of showing that Mr. Blaine is not a popular man, that he should not be nominated, and will be beaten if he is. A correspondent has asked the Sentinel some very hard questions on the subject, to which that paper makes no reply, and his last communication is not published, for the reason, probably, that it puts our esteemed contemporary in a hole.

The correspondent shows that Mr. Blaine received 1,829 more votes in our Third Congressional District than the popular Mr. La Follette received at the same time, and he shows that Blaine got 3,000 more votes in the State than the nine Republican Congressmen received put together. He also shows that Blaine received 200,000 more votes than all the Republican Congressmen in the Union put together. All this is admitted by the Sentinel. It is also forced to admit that Blaine made a better run in New York with the so-called Independents against him than any Republican has been able to make since 1884. These are cold facts that cannot be denied.

But the enemies of Mr. Blaine twist the figures of former elections to suit their one purpose, just as the free trade Democrats juggle with the figures to prove their assertions with regard to the tariff. The comparison of the Blaine vote with the Hayes vote of twelve years ago, or with the Garfield vote of eight years ago, is perfectly worthless as every sensible men must admit. The conditions in any state that influence the elections may be entirely changed in four years, local causes that were potent may have entirely disappeared and the party that was beaten one year may be victorious the next. If the day had not been rainy, Mr. Blaine would have undoubtedly have carried New York and been elected. If it had not been for "Rum, Romanism and Rebellion," he would have been elected. If St. John had been out of the field, Mr. Blaine would have been elected. Either of these trifles might, and probably would have defeated Mr. Garfield. "On such a slender thread hang everlasting things."

The Sentinel wastes much of its valuable time in vain speculations as to the figure cut by the prohibition vote and the Butler vote in the last presidential election, the number of votes in each case drawn from the Democrats and from the Republicans, with the probable effect on the result; but it utterly fails to show how all these four year old circumstances are going to affect the campaign of 1888, no matter who is the Republican candidate.

Mr. Blaine was beaten on the first trial by a very close vote in New York; and so were Jefferson and Jackson and Harrison defeated in their first race.

Northern Michigan News.

No idle men in Traverse City. Lots of work there this winter.

The lumbering business at Central Lake is booming this winter.

Two churches are talked of at the booming town of Advance.

First train crossed the international bridge at Sault Ste. Marie a week ago Saturday.

The Soo expects to absorb $1,250,000 of public and private improvements next year.

The steamer Onekema made her last trip on Grand Traverse Bay one day last week.

Grand Traverse bay is still clear of ice, and unless colder weather comes soon, will remain so a good while longer.

The Toledo, Ann Arbor & Cadillac road lost $2,000 by a wreck which occurred near Alma on an excursion one day recently.

About forty residents of Antrim county took the preliminary step towards becoming citizens of the United States.

Elk Rapids' lone, solitary policeman was badly done up by a rough one day recently, and the town is mad—awfully mad.

The Antrim county poor house will have about ten permanent inmates. It ought to have a lunatic department for Ben. Davis.

Sault Ste. Marie is bound to have everything that has in it the power to make a noise. A dynamite factory is to be the next improvement.

The Number of employes on northern division of G. R. & I., from Grand Rapids to Mackinac City, is 1,550 and they receive about $61,000 each month.

Wm. Wrauskill, of Greilick township, Grand Traverse county, lost five of his seven children in one week recently, and the other two are sick.

From January 1st the Eagle predicts 80 days of sleighing this season. This, with the 30 days we have already had, will give us our usual 100 days.

The Richardi woodenware factory at Bellaire has shut down, throwing a large number of men out of work. Lack of timber is the cause. Plenty of it in Charlevoix county.

Manistique Pioneer: Emmet county is preparing for local option, and since Charley Hampton has come out in opposition to the measure it stands a good chance of being carried.

The Sault Ste. Marie News last week gave a very graphic account of the opening of the new international bridge, illustrated with elaborate engravings, executed for use in its columns.

Mancelona has another sensation in the elopement of G. E. Bunn, a married man, with Mrs. L. Lambert, a married woman well along in years, and hitherto highly respected. Mrs. Lambert took her two children with her.

The Elk Rapids Progress is offered free for a year to any man in that town who doesn't know how to edit or manage a paper better than the editor, and will own the corn. We are inclined to think it is only one of Ben's schemes to increase the circulation of his paper.

A quarter of a century ago the Grand Traverse Congregational Association was organized with three churches and seven ministers. Since then three other associations have been organized on its territory, and all four enroll 70 prosperous churches, a pretty good showing.

Cheboygan Tribune: Dr C. A. Perrin, of Marquette, accompanied by Mrs. Perrin, and child, arrived down Monday night for a brief visit with his brother, Dr. T. A. Perrin, and family, and Mr. and Mrs. W. F. De Puy. Dr. Perrin was formerly a Charlevoix practition.

Kalkaska Leader: Where are our game wardens? A flagrant violation of the game law is reported, the culprit boasting of having killed a deer out of season. He is the engineer of G. R. & I. train No. 7, and knocked the animal out one evening last week, some distance north of Kalkaska. Probably the deer didn't know it was loaded.

"Fanning Mill" Fuller, our own E. W., presented the M. E. church at Bellaire with a new fanning mill at the close of the dedicatory services recently. It will probably be used to separate the wheat from the chaff. The next thing you will hear will be that E. W. has driven against somebodies' clothes-line and used language that will upset the whole business.

It is said that coal has been found in Springvale township, Wexford county, near the Manistee line, and the thrifty Manistee men who own land thereabouts are getting ready to reap the harvest. We have a man in Norwood township, this county, who has discovered coal or iron on his farm annually for the past twenty years, and he hasn't reaped anything yet but oats and maple syrup.

There is a rumor current that early in the spring there will be a daily passenger train running both ways between Minneapolis and New York by the way of the Minneapolis and Sault Ste. Marie and Michigan Central railroads.—Cheboygan Tribune.

The supreme court has granted an order on the application of the Attorney General requiring the Board of Supervisors of Sanilac county to comply with the law regarding the listing and taxing of mortgages. It looks as though Charlevoix county would have to come to the front.

The straits are bridged with ice. It extends as far as the eye can reach on Lake Huron and is apparently solid. If heavy weather does not break it up it will soon sustain the weight of horses everywhere. The snow is deeper than at any time last winter, being two and a half feet on the level. It is drifted in banks six and eight feet height.

At the recent annual meeting of the Traverse City Business Men's Association, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Geo. E. Steele; First Vice President, D. E. Carter; Second Vice President, J. G. Johnson; Secretary, L. Roberts; Treasurer, J. T. Beadle. S. C. Despres, J. W. Milliken and C. A. Hammond were elected as part of the Executive Committee. The Association has a membership of 104; and has money in the treasury.

East Jordan Enterprise: Prof. Allen is tutoring three or four persons in town.——S. C. Glenn, in one way and another, paid over $600 taxes on Friday.——Work on the ice rink has begun, and now it will be hurried to completion.——The mortgage of $10,000 given by Mr. Watson and wife to the Scranton & Watson Lumber Co. has just been pronounced void in the Wayne Circuit Court by Judge Jennison. This is a matter of considerable interest to many in this vicinity.

Harbor Springs Republican: Capt. Vanderhoef and family left here last Friday morning on a two week's visit to their old home in Grand Haven.——The proof sheets of Andrew J. Blackbird's long expected book have at last appeared from the press of the Ypsilantian. It is entitled "History of the Ottawa and Chippewa Indians; a grammar of their own language, and personal and family history of the author. It reads well, and will be a valuable contribution to the history of the aborigines of this section. Every library in the Traverse region should contain a copy.

Elk Rapids Progress: If there is a better kept dollar-a-day house in Northern Michigan than the Marshall House at this place, we would like to know it. S. S. Spaulding, proprietor.——Capt. Hultz, of Torch Lake, has a patent on a water indicator for boilers which has been pronounced by competent machinists as a good thing. He is making arrangements for their manufacture.——The masonic lodge of this place, has sixty or more members and has a pleasant lodge room. They have just completed a banquet hall and kitchen, which was used at the time of installation last week.

Petoskey Record: Our townsman, Gen. A. C. Litchfield, started for Detroit last night to arrange for the manufacture of his snow-plow shovel, a simple, yet effective device for cleaning sidewalks and making good foot-paths through freshly fallen snow to the depth of 15 inches. A little boy seven years old demonstrated in our streets to-day the ease with which it may be propelled. The General says his little daughter twelve years of age can run it with ease in ten inches of freshly fallen snow. The General himself gave us an ocular demonstration of its merits by cleaning a path in front of our office, and we can vouch for what appears to us to be complete adaption to the use for which it is designed. One feature which helps to assure its general adoption is that the device is so constructed as to be attached to any ordinary snow shovel in a few minutes. [This is the first we knew that that gallant trooper, Gen. A. C. Litchfield, lives in Petoskey.—ED.]

Mr. Lamar just now is on the anxious seat.

Public office was a public trust, is the newreading of the Cleveland administration motto—that is, it was several years ago, before a renomination became the absorbing topic.

It is predicted that ere long Alaska will loom up as the greatest mining country in the world, and its waters the greatest fisheries in the world. As a fur producer, that region is already pre-eminent. Alaska is far off, but great in promise.

The Supreme Court convened last Wednesday morning with a docket of 144 cases. Major Long, the new justice, took his seat. The court consists of five judges, instead of four, as heretofore. For the next two years Judge Sherwood will be chief justice of the court.

DRY GOODS!

We being the only house in Charlevoix carrying an exclusive line of Dry Goods and by devoting our whole time to this branch we can and will give better value for the money than any house carrying a mixed stock. Come and be convinced.

Thousands Say So.

Mr. T. W. Atkins, Girard Kan., writes: "I never hesitate to recommend your Electric Bitters to my customers, they give entire satisfaction and are rapid sellers." Electric Bitters are the purest and best medicine known and will positively cure Kidney and Liver complaints. Purify the blood and regulate the bowels. No family can afford to be without them. They will save hundreds of dollars in doctor's bills every year. Sold at fifty cents a bottle by Dr. G. W. Crouter.

A Walking Skeleton.

Mr. E. Springer, of Mechanicsburg, Pa., writes: "I was afflicted with lung fever and abscess on lungs, and reduced to a walking Skeleton. Got a free trial bottle of Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, which did me so much good that I bought a dollar bottle. After using three bottles, found myself once more a man, completely restored to health, with a hearty appetite, and a gain in flesh of 48 lbs." Call at Dr. G. W. Crouter's and Crouter & Harris' Drug Store and get a free trial bottle of this certain cure for all Lung Diseases. Large bottles $1.

Laborers in Panama.

Robert L. Knox, who has been connected with the Panama Railway for six months, has just returned home, and gives a startling description of life and death among the laborers on the Panama Canal. He says that Panama comes nearer being hades than any place he was ever in. The laborers die off like cattle when malaria strikes them. "I went down one day to see the canal laborers at work," said he, "and I will never forget what I saw. The weather was soft that day, and fifty or more fresh colored fellows had been brought in. In the afternoon the heat and the air had their effects upon them, and one by one they fell. I saw one man hit on the head by the excavating machine. He was killed. The body was immediately hoisted into the dumping tube, sent through the machine, and that was the last seen of him. At night when the men are through work they begin a debauch on smuggled whisky, and then they fight with knives and kill each other. In a big city you can see human nature in bad forms, but the worst forms of vice practical in New York and London and Paris are nowhere when compared with what can be seen every day on the Isthmus."

Italian Love Charms.

There are some pretty love songs in Capri. To win a girl's heart the lover must steal a hair from her head and tie it to one of his own. So long as the knot holds firm his love is returned. This resembles the charm used on the sacred hill of Monte Vergine, near Naples. There betrothed pilgrims fasten broom twigs together with a strip of rag, and until the twigs part their love endures. Rags flutter on every bush along the path to the great sanctuary, and married couples often return there to examine their united twigs. Ill-matched pairs probably scorn to renew the pilgrimage. Lovesick maids and men mix a drop of their blood in a little wine and persuade the object of their affections to drink it. This is an infallible love-philter. A man may also win a girl's heart by pricking her name upon a fig-leaf, and letting the wind blow it away.—English Illustrated Magazine.

A Sight to Feast the Eyes.

There was a sight in Buckskin Gulch yesterday that would have made the oldest placer miner's heart leap with joy. The surface gravel had been washed off, and the large cut in the jagged bedrock for over 100 feet was a mass of glittering gold. In places where it had lodged in the crevices it could be picked up by the spoonful. About a pint of nuggets, from $20 to $50 in weight, were picked up in the forenoon by Charles Dudley, and about twenty pounds of gold had already been taken to the bank, which had been scooped out of the potholes. No very large pieces had been found, the largest would probably not go over three ounces. The clean-up, which will probably take two or three days yet to make complete, will be by far the largest ever made in the camp. It is estimated to reach fifty pounds, or in the neighborhood of $9,080.—Cœur d'Alene Sun.

Philadelphia's Last Gag.

The latest gag is, "Who is that man?" with the accent on the "is" and very strong. "For 'man' you may substitute 'girl' or 'kid,'" as it is equally intelligible. It is also very exasperating, because among adepts it is accompanied by a stare and a general quizzical expression calculated to make a sensitive person feel all pins and needles. Where it came from or what it exactly means no one knows, but it is heard all over town among that class who love gags. If you don't like it your only protection is to feign not to hear it when somebody looks into your face and cries, "Who is that man?"—Philadelphia Call.

A Little Misunderstanding.

A housemaid, after being a short time in her place, gave warning. Her mistress asked her what she had to find fault with—was the work too hard, or what? No; she had nothing to complain of on that score, but she could not stand being prayed at by the master at morning prayers.

Mistress (angular)—"What on earth do you mean, Mary? Your Master does not pray at any one."

"O, yes, he does, marm; he prays at me every day, and I won't stand it any longer."

"What does he say, then?"

"Why he says, 'O Lord, who hatest nothing but the housemaid.'"

Mistress, after a little reflection and further inquiry, ascertains that Mary has thus interpreted "O Lord, who hatest nothing that Thou hast made."—London Society.

Something new and novel in the way of a cure for the consumption is described by the New York Sun. "Waiter, bring me a piece of round steak warmed on one side and raw on the other, some boiled potatoes with the skins removed cut up in hot milk and butter, a plate of radishes, green peas stewed in catsup, a plate of toasted brown bread, and a milk punch. Be sure and have the steak raw on one side, and chop it a little with the raw side up." This astonishing order came from a tall lady with a determined look and two bean-catchers in front of her ear. "She always eats that same dinner," said the waiter to the reporter. "She's got something the matter with her lungs and thinks she's struck a cure for consumption. She sings in a choir uptown somewhere."

A noted rebel chief in Tonquin was recently captured and executed. After he was taken, to the questions put to him he would give no answer, and as soon as he was captured he tried to commit suicide by tearing open his stomach with his nails, biting his tongue, scratching his eyes out, and mutilating himself in still more horrible ways. He had a very great influence with the literati. At his last examination he obtained first place and was president of the important association of Thaa-ban.

A Country of Roses.

Bulgaria, the little country in Europe which we hear so much about of late, is a veritable rose-garden in itself. In no part of the world, says Vick's Magazine, has the cultivation of the rose come so near perfection as in this small state, and, although the soil and atmosphere of the country has much to do with the success of the work, the native inhabitants have made such a careful study of the plant and its needs that they have created wonders out of their beds of blooming roses. As is well known, the flowers are grown there for the purpose of extracting the precious aroma known as "attar of rose," but this circumstance does not detract in the least from the appearance of the roses. The bushes require considerable care and attention, and they are seldom allowed to attain a height of over six feet.

In the great rose gardens where the flowers are raised for manufacturing the "attar of rose," the bushes are seldom grafted or budded. The roots forming the bushes of a young rose garden are taken from the old bushes and carefully buried with plenty of manure where they send up young shoots. These reach their full growth in about five years and for fifteen years will yield large crops of roses. When an old bed begins to fail the bushes are cut away and new shoots allowed to spring up, or the whole field plowed up and roots from another bed set out in their place. A successful rose-grower keeps several rose gardens at all times in different stages of development, so that when one garden begins to be unproductive another one is about ready to come in. The roses blossom in the latter part of May, when all the neighborhood is employed in picking them and getting them to the distillery.

In addition to the great industry of extracting the precious aroma from the roses, the inhabitants of Bulgaria make quite a business of exporting rose slips and roots to different countries. The facility with which the roses grow in the fertile valleys of that country make it a profitable business to raise the bushes for market. The cuttings for buds are sent hundreds of miles packed in long grass and surrounded with straw disposed longitudinally.

How Paper Boats Are Made.

The building of a paper boat as described is conducted as follows: The boats are made of ordinary manilla paper of good quality, usually of five thicknesses, in all only one-sixteenth of an inch thick, except in parts where there is the reinforcement of one or two strips. The process of making them is simple. A model of soft pine is made the full size of the boat, the bow being of two pieces, which can be detached. The paper is delivered in long rolls. The model is turned upside down on a large frame; one narrow strip of paper and then a second are first laid on where the keel would be, and then, one, two, three, four, five sheets are successfully laid along and moulded close to the model, each as it is put on being coated with shellac and with glue to attach the next sheet closely to it. This done up in papers, the models are taken into a drying-room, where a heat of about 140 degrees Fahrenheit, continued for five days, consolidates the glued paper into a solid mass. The movable pieces of wood at the bow are unscrewed and taken out, and with this place for a start it is easy to peel the boat off the model, as a peach-skin comes off a fresh peach. A keel is now fastened inside the boat, several extra layers of shellac are put on outside and inside, a strip of wood is fastened in for a gunwale, and the shell is presently ready for its fittings, seats, and outriggers. They are mostly racing shells from single scull up to eight-oar, but one boat has been built as large as forty-two feet long by four feet four inch beam, to hold forty-two persons, this, of course, being stayed by wooden ribs; and a steam launch nineteen feet long, worked by one-horse power oil engine, boat and engine weighing about 439 pounds, was last fall successfully run at a speed of about ten miles per hour on the upper Hudson. The cost is something above that of wood. The single scull twenty-one and one-half feet long by ten and one-half inches beam cost from $65 to $100; the eight-oared shell, about sixty feet long by twenty-four inches wide, cost $400. The racing shells of Harvard, Yale, and Columbia in 1886 were all from the same model from one shop, so that the contest was entirely one of skill on even terms. The patent for this method of building boats has just expired.

Something About Cats.

It is estimated that not less than nine million kittens are annually brought into this sinful world. Of these the great majority are miserably drowned—a practice which is destined shortly to be done away with by the recognition of the cat as a fur-bearing animal. Rugs of selected Maltese and tortoise shell are already quite expensive, and excellent imitations of various furs are made in this material. Taxidermists, too, are advertising for kittens by the thousand to stuff for ornamental purposes. At present the only purpose to which they are applied in this country is the manufacture of carriage robes, but vast numbers of them are sent to Europe, where they are in great demand for coats and hats, dressing-gown lining, and other garments.

The pelts come in from all parts of the country. They are gathered by professional collectors, who supply them by the quantity at regular schedule rates. A common cat skin is worth 5 cents, a pure Maltese 10 cents, and a black one 25 cents. A carriage robe of the best cat fur is worth from $10 to $50. There are always plenty of stray cats running wild in the rural districts. The Maine woods are full of them. They breed wonderfully fast and it is good sport popping them off the fences and stone walls along the roadside.—Boston Herald.

SPEAKER CARLISLE.

His Difficult Task of Arranging the House Committees.

SPEAKER CARLISLE is having no end of trouble in the work of constructing the committees, says a Washington special. This is always a troublesome job, but the Speaker finds greater difficulty in adjusting members this year than ever before. A gentleman with whom the Speaker has discussed this question informed me that there is no difficulty experienced with the new members. The older members cause all the annoyance and are primarily responsible for the delay in completing the work. The older members act as if they had special rights to assignments to particular places of their own selection, regardless of their fitness. Every one of these members informs the Speaker of his desires in this particular and expects his wishes to be respected.

Two men boarded the engine, covered the engineer and his fireman with their guns, and ordered them to go on and stop at Boggy Bridge. When that point was reached the train was stopped and the engineer and fireman put under guard. Here five others joined the gang. Three went to the express car. The express messenger went to the door just as the men appeared. Seeing their Winchesters, he took in the situation and shut the heavy door in their faces before resistance could be offered. He then put out the lights, and he and the baggageman, armed with pistols, fortified themselves between the express freight and lay down to await results. The robbers failing to break open the door, they fired thirty or forty shots into the express car and a volley into the Pullman sleeper, and then gave up the job and allowed the train to proceed, having detained it thirty minutes.

A Bill to Regulate the Holding of Congressional Elections in Certain Southern States.

[Washington telegram to Chicago Inter Ocean.]

Senator W. E. Chandler will call the attention of the Senate at an early date to a measure to which he has given much thought, the object of which is to provide for a free election in the Southern States. This he proposes to do by the enactment of a law, a bill for which he has just introduced in the Senate, the nature of which will fully appear from the explanation by Mr. Chandler himself in the following interview. He said:

"There ought to be no more delay in making the attempt thus to control the election of Representatives in Congress, and, if the attempt is not successful, to put the responsibility where it belongs. I see no reason why the Republicans of the Senate should not be willing to pass the bill which I have presented, or some other bill of a similar character. If it does not pass the House it will be the fault of the Democratic party. If the South, with thirty-eight electoral votes and thirty-eight Congressional votes based upon the colored population, is determined that negroes shall not vote, the South at least ought to be forced to confine its suppression of the suffrage to State officers. RAILROAD BUILDING.

About Twelve Thousand Miles of Rail Constructed During the Past Year.

[Chicago telegram.]

The Railroad Gazette for this week has the following in regard to railroad construction for 1887:

It is an opinion pretty generally held that the railroad building this year will exceed that of 1882, when 11,568 miles were constructed. Naturally opinions differ as to whether the investment has not been more than the conditions warrant. It is, however, a reassuring fact that a great proportion of the new road building of 1887 is designed and located to develop new business rather than to fight for what exists already or for retaliation. All along the Western frontier we see the same phenomenon—the old roads reaching out further and further into young territory, and it is a territory of which the contributions to commerce have only begun. In the Northwest, for instance, while it is true that the Montana extension of the Manitoba parallels the Northern Pacific, it is also true that between the two roads lies a belt of country from 70 to 150 miles wide which will before many years support a dense population. In the Southwest the wisdom of extending lines into New Mexico and Arizona is more questionable, but the lines now watching the Indian Territory are in position to take immediate advantage of the opening of that fertile region. Much of the far Western building has been and is in obedience to the forces which are pushing the center of gravity steadily in that direction. The Missouri River for a time furnished a convenient and apparently natural stopping-place, but the roads which have crossed into the territory beyond can now fix only an arbitrary terminus. Before them is always a field of possible profit, which they must occupy or their rivals will. In the Southern States the recent great activity has also

INTRODUCTORY.

It is the afternoon of a Palestinian spring day, A. D. 28. The scene is a retired spot on the northeast coast of the Sea of Galilee, suddenly made populous by the presence of the thronging multitude. They have hastened around the narrow neck of the sea, and anticipated our Lord's coming; and he, though weary, his eyes taking in the outlines of the straggling throng, like a flock of shepherdless sheep, straightway puts forth words of instruction and hands of healing. [illegible] the time, from the same compassion, comes the feeding of the multitude, and unbroken streams of refreshing flow forth to all. The event is a marvelous one. Christ blesses and breaks, the disciples take and pass on to the people, who in turn pass along from neighbor to neighbor, and there is still no diminution of supply. Presently, here they come bearing twelve baskets, lying empty before, filled now to the brim with yet more bread and fishes. It is the crown of all the miracles. "Come," they say, "let us make him king!" But there is a constraining presence before them, and a moment later they find themselves in groups quietly dispersing and whispering in awed restraint: "Of a truth this is that prophet which should come into the world." And when they look back to the hill it is empty, but in the recesses of a neighboring mountain a lone, yet kingly figure is bowed in the passion of prayer.

WHAT THE LESSON TEACHES.

[illegible]

FAITH.

BY JOHN STUART BLACKIE.

What thing is faith? Ask thou the gleesome boy
Who for the first time breasts the buoyant wave;
'Tis faith that leads him with adventurous joy
To follow where they plunge, his comrades brave.
Ask thou the boor who eats and drinks and sleeps,
And loves and hates and hopes, and fears and prays,
Fishes and fowls, works day and Sabbath keeps,
And, where life's sign-post points his path, obeys.
Or ask the sage, with subtle-searching looks,
Well trained all things in heaven and earth to scan;
Or ask the scholar primed with Greekish books:
All live by faith of what is best to man.
Or him, sharp-eyed, with fine atomic science,
The loves and hates of lively dust pursuing;
Who tortures Nature with all strange appliance
To drag to light the secret of her doing.
Ask thou the captain who with goes sublime
Mapped forth new worlds on his night-watching pillow,
And saw in vision a fresh start of time,
Big with grand hopes beyond the Atlantic billow.
Ask thou the soldier who on bristling lances
Rushes undaunted, breathing valorous breath,
And, where his leader cheers him on, advances
To glorious victory o'er huge heaps of death.
Or ask the patriot who, when foes were strong,
And faithless friends had sold their rights for pelf,
Waits till harsh need and shame rouse the base throng
Into the high-souled echo of himself.
Ask thou the statesman, when the infuriate mob
Brays senseless vetoes on his wisest plans;
Unmoved he stands, his bosom ne'er throbs;
His eye the calm evolving future scans.
Or ask the martyr, who, when tyrants tear
His quivering flesh, with calm assurance dies;
Sweet life he loves, but scorns to breathe an air
Drugged with the taint of soul-destroying lies.
In such know faith, faith or in man or God,
In thine own heart, or tried tradition's stream;
'Tis one same sun that paints the flowery sod,
And shoots from pole to pole the quickening beam.
God is the Power which shapes this pictured scene,
Soul of all creatures, substance of all creeds;
Faith the intuition quick and instinct keen,
To know His voice and follow where He leads.

CHAPTER V.

IN a stately mansion, high up on the side of a mountain in Virginia, Miss Isabel Randolph sat by her handsome grate, where a fire blazed brightly, and mused of the past. Her thoughts were evidently not pleasant ones, for she sighed now and then, and glanced sadly out of the window on the glori-

"Yes," watching her narrowly and enjoying her evident anguish. "The ranch burned, as I say, and that leaves me his heir, as he left no will, in fact made no provision for his little adopted daughter."

"His—what?" in surprise.

"His adopted daughter. Ah, so this is news to you! Well, it seemed it was a little waif Richard picked up in some Southern city. I never knew the particulars, but she is a lovely girl of about seventeen, I should judge. He called her his daughter, and she never knew that she was not what she seemed until I had the pleasure of informing her that she had no claim whatever legally upon Richard Fairleigh's fortune."

The lady had lifted one white hand to her eyes as if to conceal their pain or surprise, and asked in a husky voice:

"Her name?"

"Nora, he called her. Nora Fairleigh."

Then that for which he had been half prepared at the beginning of their conversation took place. Miss Isabel Randolph sank back in her chair in a dead faint.

"Queer," he thought, puzzled for once in his life, "that she should faint over his adopted daughter, and take his death as calmly as she did. Ah, she's coming around."

She recovered slowly at first, but when his dark, evil face grew plainer, gloating over her misery, she struggled for composure and conquered.

"The story you bring is so terrible, it is enough to weaken stronger nerves than mine. Are you quite sure that Richard is dead—have you undoubted proof of that?"

"Oh, yes, we have positive proof, and I have possession of his valuable papers that prove me to be his true heir. Congratulate me, fair cousin, upon my good fortune."

"I have no congratulations for you. Is your call not at an end? Surely you have told me enough bad news for one visit."

[illegible]

"Not much you won't; you jist keep yer eyes peeled. I've larned ye how to shoot first rate, and we'll all be back in less than a week."

Then Jim muttered to himself:

"It's agin the Cap'n's orders, but I can't help that. Every man will be needed in the dangerous undertaking. Skete's too big a coward to attempt to escape, and if he did he'd never find his way home; that is, not with his wool on."

Thus it happened that Skete was left in charge of the robbers' stronghold and no trouble apprehended.

No sooner were the members of the band quite out of sight than Skete had a double shuffle all to himself, and actually stood on his head a second—a feat he had not attempted for the past twenty-five years.

"Golly! bress de Lor! Now if Skete ain't in luck. Stay here and keep de house, and jes' wait till you nice, bery nice gentlemen come back! Golly," snapping his fingers in the direction that they had taken, "if I aint a makin' tracks 'fore an hour, den I am a fool, sure. Oh, hi, yi; do idee ob me waitin' till dey come back. Now, Miss Nora, honey, Skete's a comin'; he may be long while, but he'll git dar, oh, yes, honey; he'll git dar."

Skete made his humble preparations as quickly as possible; he gathered together a small bag of broiled meat and crackers and seized his rifle and the revolvers Jim had thought best to leave him, as well as a long sharp knife and small dagger he purloined from the outfit of the band.

The bag he swung across his shoulder, the knives and revolver he fastened in his belt, the small knife in his breast, and the rifle he carried in his hand ready for any emergency.

Poor, simple Skete. He had heard of the vastnesses of the mountain ranges, of the wide desolate plains, of the dangerous red foe on every side; but he dimly comprehended it all. One idea was firmly fixed in his dull brain, and that was that he must escape and find his beloved mistress; that he must tell

NATIVITY OF CHRIST.

Rev. Dr. Talmage's Christmas Sermon at the Tabernacle.

It Was Not Accident That Christ Was Born in a Stable—The Alleviator of Brutal Suffering as Well as the Redeemer of Man.

BROOKLYN, Dec. 25. Services to-day at the Brooklyn Tabernacle were jubilant. Professors Browne and Ali, with organ and cornet, were unusually powerful, and Mrs. Florence Rice-Knox sang three solos. The thousands of people who packed the church and all the approaches seemed to join in the great chorus:

He shall reign from pole to pole
With illimitable sway,
He shall reign when, like a scroll,
Yonder heavens have passed away.

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., took as the subject of his sermon, "The Barn and Its Surroundings." His text was taken from Luke ii, 15: "The shepherds said one to another, let us now go even unto Bethlehem and see this thing which is come to pass." Dr. Talmage said:

One thousand years of the world's existence rolled painfully and wearily along, and no Christ. Two thousand years, and no Christ. Three thousand years, and no Christ. Four thousand years, and no Christ. "Give us a Christ," had cried Assyrian and Persian and Chaldean and Egyptian civilizations, but the lips of the earth and the lips of the sky made no answer. The world had already been affluent of genius. Among poets had appeared Homer and Thespis and Aristophanes and Sophocles and Euripides and Alexis Æschylus, yet no Christ to be the most poetic figure of the centuries. Among historians had appeared Herodotus and Xenophon and Thucydides, but no Christ from whom all history was to date backward and forward—B. C. and A. D. Among conquerors Camillus and Manlius and Regulus and Xantippus and Hannibal and Scipio and Pompey and Cæsar, yet no Christ who was to be conqueror of earth and heaven.

But the slow century and the slow year and the slow month and the slow hour at last arrived. The world had had matins or concerts in the morning and vespers or concerts in the evening, but now it is to have a concert at midnight. The black window shutters of a December night were thrown open, and some of the best singers of a world where they all sing stood there, and putting back the drapery of cloud chanted a peace anthem, until all the echoes of hill and valley applauded and encored the hallelujah chorus.

At last the world has a Christ, and just the Christ it needs. Come, let us go into that Christmas scene as though we had never before worshiped at the manger. Here is a Madonna worth looking at. I wonder not that the most frequent name in all lands and in all Christian centuries is Mary. And there are Marys in palaces and Marys in cabins, and though German and French and Italian and Spanish and English pronounce it differently, they are all namesakes of the one whom we find on a bed of straw with her pale face against the soft cheek of Christ in the night of the Nativity. All the great painters have tried on canvas to present Mary and her child and the incidents of that most famous night of the world's history. Raphael in three different masterpieces celebrated them. Tintoret and Ghirlandajo surpassed themselves in the "Adoration of the Magi." Correggio needed to do nothing more than his "Madonna" to become immortal. The "Madonna of the Lily," by Leonardo da when he allowed himself to be called in one place a lion and in another place a lamb. Meanwhile, may the Christ of the Bethlehem cattle-pen have mercy on the suffering stock yards that are preparing diseased and fevered meat for our American households.

Behold also in this Bible scene how on that Christmas night God honored childhood. Christ might have made His first visit to our world in a cloud, as He will descend on His next visit in a cloud. In what a chariot of illuminated vapor He might have rolled down the sky, escorted by mounted cavalry with lightning of drawn sword. Elijah had a carriage of fire to take him up; why not Jesus a carriage of fire to fetch Him down? Or, over the arched bridge of a rainbow the Lord might have descended. Or Christ might have had His mortality built up on earth out of the dust of a garden, as was Adam, in full manhood at the start, without the introductory feebleness of infancy. No, no! Childhood was to be honored by that advent. He must have a child's light limbs and a child's dimpled hand, and a child's beaming eye, and a child's flaxen hair, and babyhood was to be honored for all time to come, and a cradle was to mean more than a grave. Mighty God! May the reflection of that one child's face be seen in all infantile places. Enough have all these fathers and mothers on hand if they have a child in the house. A throne, a crown, a scepter, a kingdom under charge. Be careful how you strike him across the head, jarring the brain. What you say to him will be centennial and millennial, and 100 years and 1,000 years cannot stop the echo and re-echo. Do not say "it is only a child;" rather say "it is only an immortal." It is only a masterpiece of Jehovah. It is only a being that shall outlive sun and moon and star, and ages quadrillennial. God has infinite resources, and can give presents of great value, but when He wants to give the richest possible gift to a household He looks around all the world and all the universe and then gives a child. The greatest present that God ever gave our world He gave about 1887 years ago, and He gave it on a Christmas night, and it was of such value that Heaven adjourned for a recess and came down and broke through the clouds to look at it. Yes, in all ages God has honored childhood. He makes almost every picture mother. The first word a child utters is apt to be, "mother," and the old man in his dying dream calls, "Mother! mother!" It matters not whether she was brought up in the surroundings of a city, and in affluent home, and was dressed appropriately with reference to the demands of modern life, or whether she wore the old-time cap, and great round spectacles, and apron of her own make, and knit your socks with her own needles seated by the broad fireplace with great back-logs ablaze on a winter night. It matters not how many wrinkles crossed and recrossed her face, or how much her shoulders stooped with the burdens of a long life, if you painted a Madonna hers would be the face. What a gentle hand she had when we were sick, and what a voice to soothe pain, and was there any one who could so fill up a room with peace and purity and light? And what a sad day that was when we came home and she could greet us not, for her lips were forever still. Come back, mother, this Christmas day, and take your old place, and as ten, or twenty, or fifty years ago, come and open the old Bible you used to read, and kneel in the same place where you used to pray, and look upon us as of old when you wished us a Merry Christmas or a Happy New Year. But no! That would not be fair to call you back. You had trouble enough, and aches enough, and bereavements enough while you were here. Tarry by the throne, mother, till we join you there, your prayers all answered, and in the eternal homestead of our God we shall again keep Christmas jubilee together. But speak from your thrones, all you glorified mothers, and say to all these, your sons and daughters, words of love, words of warning, words of cheer. They need your voice for they have traveled far and with many a heartbreak since you left them, and you do well to call from the heights of Heaven to the valleys of earth. Hail, enthroned ancestry! We are coming. Keep a place for us right beside you at the banquet.

Slow footed years! More swiftly run
Into the gold of that unsetting sun.
Homesick we are for thee,
Calm land beyond the sea.

Infinite Wisdom in a Brief Life.

"But why," exclaimed the hoary-headed sage, as the youth looked listlessly out of the window and sighed wearily, "why should you, so young, so

A Shorn Land.

Farmer Grind drew a long, deep sigh and stood it up against a slanting sunbeam which came into the barn through a crack in the big door where he was at work. It was just as well to preserve it, for sighs were not as fresh and bright with him as they used to be in days before he had the [illegible], so he thought it best to lay it by for future use. In fact, Farmer Grind laid every thing by for future use that he could.

It was really sad to see this white-haired old man, this weather-beaten green stump of the forest, bowed down with grief, and the pitiful tears came into his eyes and trickled down to the end of his nose, from which he ever and anon wiped them with the back of his gnarled and brawny hand.

"You seem under the influence of a heavy sorrow, Brother Grind," remarked the young parson, who had entered unperceived, and seated himself on an upturned horse bucket, while the farmer was stuffing another bunch of straw into the cutter.

The farmer looked up from his work with a weary smile of recognition and replied, after he had changed his quid to the other cheek:

"Yes, brother, the hand of misfortune has rested heavily upon me. I try to bear it like a Christian, but it's mighty hard, parson, and it goes powerful agin the grain to be resigned."

"I hope so, my afflicted brother, and trust that I may offer the consolations of religion," said the parson, sympathetically: "but in what way have you been bereaved? I hope your wife—"

"Oh, Betsy is all right," interrupted the farmer.

"And the children? I had not heard. You have not lost any of the children?" and the parson grew more animated in his interest.

"Not as I knows of," said the farmer, "not a blamed kid; the children are all doing well enough."

"Where, then, has the blow fallen, brother?

AN OPEN LETTER.

Wm. Black Tenders His Resignation as President of the Agricultural Society of the County.

To the Directors and Members of the Charlevoix County Agricultural Society:

GENTLEMEN: It is with feelings of sorrow and deep regret that I address you on this occasion; but circumstances over which I have no control make it necessary that I tender you my resignation as President.

When elected to that office it was to me a great surprise; and for the respect and consideration shown me, the Society has my most ardent wishes for its success, and the members, individually, my kindest wishes for their welfare.

Nearly two years ago my sight began to fail. I have, on one eye, what is known as a cataract, and in conjunction with that, inflammation of the optic nerve, which has severed the connection between the eye and the outside world.

In full realization of the approaching darkness, I think it my duty to inform you of my situation, in order to give you ample time to deliberate, and elect my successor.

The Society, though yet comparatively in its infancy, has done much to open up to view the resources of this section of Michigan. But it has much more to do before it has fulfilled its mission. Energy, perseverance, in connection with a clear, wise forecast of the situation of passing events, will enable you to accomplish greater and better results than you can at present anticipate.

Let progress be your watchword, and success will follow your efforts. However useful the Society may be in the improvement of stock, either animal or vegetable, do not forget that the human stock stands in more need of renovation and improvement than the seeds and flowers and grain you cultivate.

Let stirpiculture be made a study by the Society; it is of more importance to the welfare of society than the improvement of the horse or cow, because the stability and solidity of our civilization depends more upon our own improvement than that of our animals and plants.

The history of the progress of this government and people presents a phase in the history of the world unparalleled in any age. When we think of the rapid increase and spread of population over this vast continent, —a population gathered from every nation under heaven; speaking all languages; with opinions antagonistic to each other, yet, in a little while becoming assimilated as one People, with one interest,—a spectacle is presented which is unequaled in the world's history.

Then again, when we think of the rapid increase of material wealth, both national and individual, we see in it something unparalleled. But under all this greatness and grandeur may be seen the viper which saps the vitals of our civilization. Though we are in one sense a great Nation, with grand prospects of a noble future, we must understand that that future depends upon our work in the present. If we are vigilant and watchful in correcting and eliminating the many evils which crowd upon us, all will be well. If we fail in this, we must accept the result.

Don't forget that the past has made the present, as the present will make the future. If we sow tares, don't be disappointed if we reap tares at harvest-time; if we sow the wind, don't complain if we reap the whirlwind.

With sincere regret that I can be of no further use to the Society or to myself, I remain, gentlemen,

Yours with respect,
WILLIAM BLACK.

Ironton Notes.

"Sam Alec" is working for R. L. Allen.

R. A. Miller was in Boyne City last week.

Mrs. Capt. Williams is on the sick list. Mrs. Dorrance is also reported sick.

J. H. Purvis and wife were in South Arm on a visit Thursday and Friday last.

Week of prayer was observed in the M. E. Church by services each evening during the week.

Frank and Charlie Noyes, and Charlie Wisner are camping and getting out cedar for Capt. Bennet.

The Company will keep the small kilns burning all winter, storing the coal instead of piling all the wood in the yard.

On Wednesday, the 28th, at the residence of the bride's parents, occurred the marriage of Mr. Geo. McMulkin and Miss Anna Williams, the ceremony being performed by Rev. Dorrance. Both the young people are old residents, and have been connected with every social event of importance since Ironton has aspired to the dignity of a village. The groom has for some years outside foreman for the Company, and was the recipient of handsome presents from Mr. Cherrie, and the men under him. The bride is the eldest daughter of Capt. and Mrs. Richard Williams. After the ceremony the happy couple left for Mancelona, where they remained a few days visiting friends, returning on Tuesday. On that evening they gave a reception at the Munson hotel, which was a pleasant social event.

COFFEE AND BAYONETS.

The G. A. R. Event of Monday Night a Big Success.

Charlevoix people always turn out when Baxter Post, G. A. R., has any doings, because Charlevoix is a patriotic community, and delights to honor her veterans. Therefore Opera Hall was crowded Monday night.

Major Green installed the new officers of the Post—seating as his successor in the chair of Commander, the old Division Surgeon, Dr. David C. Chamberlain. The new Commander saw plenty of carnage in his war days, and if any man can honor the position it is "Old Sawbones."

The retiring and new Commanders made brief addresses; singing and band music followed; the old vets showed the audience how they used to live on the field and in camp, and then it was announced that "rations" were ready.

The "rations" were a sinful departure from the regulation coffee and hard-tack which the Post has heretofore served. Such feasts as that at Opera Hall will soon destroy the traditions of the camp-fire. No more such inovations, boys.

Baxter Post No. 119, G. A. R., was instituted five years ago with 26 charter members. The roster now shows a membership of 85—one new member being mustered in Monday evening—H. V. Rifenburg who belonged to a Pennsylvania regiment, and saw three years of service in the Army of the Potomac.

PLATFORM ECHOES.

John B. Gough's Last and Best Book.

This new and splendidly illustrated volume is the last book written by the world-famous John B. Gough, and was completed by him just previous to his death. Every one is familiar with the story of his early life, and of his rescue from a drunkard's grave, and how this once wretched and despised sot became one of the most famous men of our time. For seven years he stood amid the horrors of delerium tremens, an abject slave to the bottle; and his condition and wretched appearance were such as to cause people to exclaim, "There's the man who has been in hell." The rich and poor, the high and low, the learned and unlearned, have been alike thrilled and moved by his burning words. He swayed brilliant audiences of royalty and fashion; spoke in state prisons, jails, poor-houses, penitentiaries, reform schools, and houses of correction; to the deaf, dumb, and blind; To audiences composed wholly of outcasts; and to audiences numbering thousands of children. At his feet more than ten million people sat and listened in admiration and wonder. In his library may be seen a set of large volumes—a far better memorial of his life and labors than any monument of marble or bronze—containing the original signatures of one hundred and fifty thousand men and women who were induced to sign the pledge through his personal efforts. These names—many of them tear-bedewed and written with a trembling hand—represent stories of happiness and woe, of ruin and remorse, of blighted hopes and wasted lives, of battles fought and victories won. To give some of these thrilling life histories; to depict scenes of joy and sadness; to lift the curtain on life's stage and show its tragedy and comedy; and to draw "living truths" from the lessons thus taught, and bring them home to every heart, is the prime object of this volume. It also contains the history of Mr. Gough's life and career, from the cradle to the grave, and the story of his death by Rev. Lyman Abbott, the eminent editor and divine.

"Platform Echoes" is John B. Gough in print. Stranger stories are here told than romance ever dreamed of, every one of them drawn from real life by a master hand. In every chapter he weaves in anecdote after anecdote, incident after incident, story after story, and underneath them all lie "Living Truth," that stand out as beacon lights. He plays upon the reader's feelings as with an enchanter's wand, at one time filling his heart with gladness, at another blinding his eyes with tears. At his bidding, hearts are melted, and stern, strong men, as well as sensitive women, weep tears of compassion, are aroused to indignation, or moved to uncontrollable laughter in spite of every effort to control their feelings.

Its illustrations are the best we have ever seen. It contains two hundred and twenty-seven fine engravings by the best artists and engravers in the world. Many of these illustrations are "too funny for anything," while others depict wretchedness and woe. Sixteen of these engravings are full page ones, and are magnificent specimens of art. Two hundred and nine are text illustrations. There are two fine steel-plate portraits. One is from a life-size full length painting, showing Mr. Gough as he appeared shortly after his rescue. The other is from a photograph taken just before his death. All in all, it is one of the finest ever produced by the American press.

We advise our readers to buy Platform Echoes at the first opportunity. They can, in our opinion, much better afford to dispense with a dozen other books than not possess this. Once begun it will not willingly be laid aside till the last page is finished.

The business men of a town who advertise are universally the successful men; and the town that gives the most generous support to its local papers is the town that is bound to grow and develop. The unanimous verdict of the successful mercantile men of the country is that printer's ink pays. All the great business men of the country, men engaged in extensive mercantile operations, have been men who have advertised widely and liberally. Especially does it pay the small town to deal liberally with its local press. A paper in a town is a power for good in the development of the place. It advertises its business, calls attention to its natural advantages, shows up its facilities and draws people in to locate and become permanent residents. Its value can not be over-estimated.

THE SUPERVISORS.

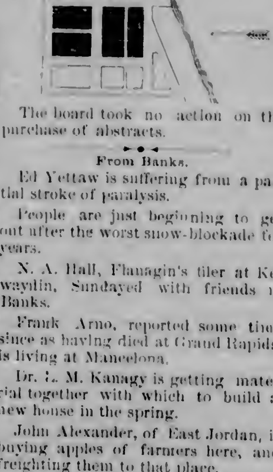
What the County Dads Did at Their Special Session Last Week.

The Board of Supervisors met on Tuesday of last week, pursuant to call; full Board present.

A resolution was passed that the county pay for the recording of all deeds and discharges of mortgages, and that the Supervisors receive and transmit these insruments from their respective Townships to the Register of Deeds.

The Board purchased two new safes, one formerly used by the Boyne City Bank and one from the Chicago Safe Co., at a total expense of $600, including the old safes.

The Board voted to change the court house site to bloch accepted as a gift from Nicholls & Morgan. [The following map will indicate the new site—the smaller black mark across the river from the four dark blocks.]



The board took no action on the purchase of abstracts.

From Banks.

Ed Yettaw is suffering from a partial stroke of paralysis.

People are just beginning to get out after the worst snow-blockade for years.

N. A. Hall, Flanagin's tiler at Kewaydin, Sundayed with friends in Banks.

Frank Arno, reported some time since as having died at Grand Rapids, is living at Mancelona.

Dr. L. M. Kanagy is getting material together with which to build a new house in the spring.

John Alexander, of East Jordan, is buying apples of farmers here, and freighting them to that place.

The boiler in Flanagin's mill sprung aleak one day last week, compelling them to shut down a few days for repairs.

El. Coulter made a combined business and pleasure trip to Grand Rapids last week. He took his Sunday girl along, and stopped for a visit with his friends at Leroy.

Hazings from Hayes.

Thos. Murry and wife have gone to Ionia Co. on a visit.

Miss Maud Scott spent vacation at home. She returned to School at Charlevoix Monday.

We think Hayes will roll up a good majority for local option. Our town pays the $100 poor tax to support the poor, made so by whisky.

One of our Hayesites while riding home from Petoskey with a neighbor the other day, espied a jug and a familiar shaped bottle in the back part of the sled, and he thought they were loaded with his favorite beverage. So he threw the jug into a snow-drift, pocketed the bottle and slipped out of the sled, bent on having a good time. He hastily took a drink from the bottle without stopping to investigate, and behold it was filled with hartshorn liniment. He gasped, sneezed, strangled, and his eyes popped out like door-knobs. He hadn't courage enough to tackle the jug, which was filled with molasses, and the owner concluded that the dose of liniment would compensate for the damage done.

What advantage does a registered package have, as regards safety of transit, over a package mailed in an ordinary way? We don't see why, any package, valuable or invaluable, should not be delivered safely, if the postage is paid, whether it is registered or not. Presumably, the government mantains the Post-office Department for the purpose of transacting the people's business, and there should be no extra charge for doing it. The practice of registering any sort of mail matter is a swindle practiced under the sanction of law, and is so regarded by business men. A registered letter or package is no more likely to be delivered than any other properly directed and properly stamped matter, and the department does not hold itself liable in case a registered package is lost. Moreover, the fact that a package or letter is registered is a notice to any thief in the office, if there should be one, that the matter is valuable. The practice is a fraud.

—This year will contain 366 days, or one more than any of the three years immediately preceeding it, and in addition to being leap year, 1888 will have five eclipses. One or more of the most prominent planets will also be visible in the evening sky each month.

—Mrs. P. J. Howard, of Bay View, well give a temperence talk in Jefferies hall on Friday evening, of this week. Mrs. Howard will review some of the proceedings of the National Convention of the W. C. —Prof. Ralph M. Enos, son of Prof H. M. Enos, of this place is now superintendent of the public school at Scotland, Dakota. —The item in our last issue regarding the change in the Crouter drug store is capable of misconstruction in the sentence stating that Mr. Beaman "will bring into business a thorough knowledge of pharmacy". Dr Crouter is a druggist of well known ability, and George Wilson is a regularly registered Pharmacist. George will remain with Mr Beaman.

—The pupils of Mrs. Kane and Miss Cochran gave an interesting Musicale at the residence of L. E. Allen last Wednesday evening. The feature of the evening most heartily enjoyed by all was the sleigh-rides Dr. Lewis treated them with before and after the exercises, and we are sure that Dr. Lewis occupies the front rank with Santa Claus in the juvenile mind.

—The new law taxing mortgages has a hard time of it. A resolution was offered at the session of the Kent county board of supervisors to countermand the order on the secretary of state for the books in which to keep a record of the mortgages for taxation. The supervisors look upon the legislative enactment, taxing mortgages as iniquitous and oppressive and will wait before investing in record books until the supreme court is heard from on the Sanilac county case.

—The Petoskey Record has the following item concerning Miss Gage, who was last year a teacher in the Charlevoix high school: By card received by Mr. B. F. Gage this morning he learns that his daughter Miss Ina M. Gage came near being cremated at Charlotte on Sunday night. She was awakened by cries of fire, and though stupefied with the smoke escaped from her chamber and the house. Her effects were also saved. Miss Gage is successfully teaching in the Charlotte schools this year and her friends will be glad to know that she escaped from so great a danger.

—"I never in my life," says John Wanamaker, of Philadelphia, used such a thing as a poster, a dodger, or a hand bill. My plan for fifteen years has been to buy so much space in a newspaper and fill it up with what I wanted. I would not give an advertisement of 400 circulation for 5,000 dodgers or posters. If I wanted to sell cheap jewelry or run a lottery scheme I might use posters, put I wouldn't insult a decent reading public with hand bills." Mr. Wanamaker is one of the most successful business men of the country. Commencing with but little capital he has built up one the largest businesses of any man in the United States, and he attributes his success largely to the judicious and constant use of the advertising columns of the press.

—After you get angry and stop your paper just poke your finger in water, pull it out and look for the hole. Then you will know how badly you are missed. A man who thinks a paper cannot live without his support ought to go off and stay awhile. When he comes back half his friends will not know that he was gone and the other half will not care a cent, while the world at large kept no account of his movement. You will find things you cannot endorse in every paper. Even the Bible is rather plain and hits some hard licks. If you were to get mad and burn your Bible the hundreds of presses would still go on printing it; and when you stop your paper and call the editor names the paper will still be published, and what is more—you'll read it on the sly.—Ex.

—On the wall of the editorial room of the Petoskey Independent (Greenback) there has hung a map, illustrating the history of the political parties. Across the map, from left to right, through devious ways, are traced the course of two broad lines representing the two great parties, while from them diverge, through snake-like sinuosities, the smaller parties, traced in divers colors. The two great lines are figuratively brought up to the present epoch by abrupt contact with the border which skirts the map. At the termination of the Democratic tracing, Brer Hampton, some time ago, with his greenback editorial pencil, facetiously added an interrogation point. Will Captain Bonteeou please inform us if the map is still on the wall, and if so, have any marginal notes been recently added? We have been informed that the map had been removed to a more private room in the basement, the interrogation point erased, and the map enlarged to permit a continuation of the tracing.

—The following concerning two well known steamers trading here last season is from the Milwaukee Wisconsin: Inasmuch as some difference of opinion still exists regarding the price actually paid by R. J. Pauley for the Chesapeake Bay iron steamers Roanoke and Westover, the Wisconsin is enabled to state on good authority that Mr. Pauley paid $6,000 for one of them and $7,000 for the other, or $13,000 for both. Of the purchase money $2,000 was paid down, with a grant of three years time in which to pay the balance. Conceding that the figures geven are correct, it must be admitted that Mr. Pauley made one the best purchases of steam property put on record last season, as the steamers are both well suited for shoal water trade, neither of them drawing over ten and one-half feet of water loaded with a trifle over 400 tons of freight.

—Charles S. Hampton, editor of the Petoskey Independent-Democrat, has always, up to this year of our Lord, been a Greenbacker, and for a number of years has been the head and front of that party in Northern Michigan and a wheel-horse in the Michigan combination. In his political utterances he has been as denunciatory of the Democratic party as he has been abusive of Republicanism. During the last Presidential campaign he supported the widow Butler and abused Cleveland, and now he throws himself into the arms of the Democracy and tries to prove that he is consistent. The fact of the matter is, having got a Democratic newspaper plant and its Bourbon constituency on his hands, he is a Democrat "for revenue only," and no amount of wordy newspaper twaddle will satisfy any person to the contrary. Julius Cæsar! We would give half our fortune for free and untrammeled access to the files of the old Harbor Springs Independent for the next ten months! Brer Hampton would call on angels and ministers of grace to defend him from the ghosts and spooks and spectres and goblins damned that would rise from the tomb of his enshrouded political sponse to haunt him. He would lose his appetite and grow poor; his eye would lose its accustomed brightness and his step its elacticity; all would seem dark, and life would be a burden. In short, he would wish he was in sheol or Harbor Springs. Oh, be Gravy, we would have [illegible] with Charlie.

Historical Society.

Knowing the success attending the efforts of "Mine Host" in almost everything he undertakes, it will add meaning to the common-place phrase "a pleasant evening" was passed at the residence of Prof. H. M. Enos, by those who braved the seemingly terrific elements of the winter king last Friday evening. Miss Phila Wood opened the programme with an instrumental solo, doing herself much credit in its execution. The ladies present will ever hold Mrs. Enos in grateful remembrance for valuable instruction as to the manner in which husbands may be taken care of during a thunder storm. Then followed the paper of the evening by Miss Gray; an instrumental solo by Miss Maggie Enos; conversation led by Maj. E. H. Green and Mrs. O. S. Washburn. Lena Washburn resigned her position on the Executive Committee and Miss Phila Wood was elected to fill the vacancy. Major Edw. H. Green will entertain the society next Friday evening. Paper by Fred M. Green on "Henry the VI." Conversation led by O. S. Washburn and Mrs. F. W. Mayne.

—We are glad to learn that a move is on foot to secure the services of Prof. Gordon, of Petoskey, for a school of vocal music here. Prof. Gordon will be here Monday, and a meeting will be held to start the matter. The professor is well known here having several years ago held institutes in this village. He is thorougly a master of his profession, and can elevate Charlevoix to a higher musical plane, if he is given an opportunity.

—East Jordan notes: The Meech mill will stock with cedar and run by Meech & Son, Arthur Meech having personal supervision of affairs.——The hoop factory is putting in their usual large supply of logs and expect to start up earlier in the season than last year.——The Vance mill, five miles east of this place, is now running to its fullest capacity, trying to fill our docks with its product of hardwood lumber, whence it is now hauled by team.——It is a conundrum whether the affairs of the Stoepel Lumber Co. vs. the Scranton & Watson Lumber Co. will get through the courts in time to stock for the coming season.——The local option rage has struck here and a vote on it will be taken Feb. 14 next. The saloon men here claim they will all vote in favor of local option as then they can sell temperance drinks and avoid paying licence.—— Howard Weikel is before Justice Barbour on examination for selling liquor to Daniel DeLong after being forbidden so to do by DeLong's wife. DeLong is the man who last fall was robbed of $200 while drunk. The result of the trial is looked forward to with interest as it is said to be a pretty sure case and the first one here under the new statute. If this one is a success others will follow. ——The Commercial house [illegible]

SLEEP AND DEATH.

BY ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

When Sleep drops down beside me [illegible] soul me,
Although she wears the [illegible] of a friend,
A jealous foe we prove her in the end.
In separate barks far out on dreamland's sea
She lures our wedded souls. Will winds blow free
And drift us wide apart, by the isles that tend Toward unknown worlds. Not once our strange ways blend
Through the long night, while Sleep looks on in glee.

O Death, be kinder than thy sister seems!
When at thy call we journey forth some day
Through that mysterious and unchartered strait
To lands more distant than the land of dreams,
Close, close together let our spirits stay,
Or else, with one swift stroke, annihilate!

MRS. POSSUMNOSE.

BY A. CERES FRITSCH.

Me and Seth hed bin married goin' on ten year. Our married life was about the average, that is, 'twas nuther happier nor more onfortunit than other folkses. We hed our rightful share o' trouble, or leastways we thort so; until our new neighbors moved into the house acrost the way. Arter that, me an' my man wus purty well agreed that our measure o' trouble was more'n rightly orter fall to our share, that it was heaped up an' runnin' over.

Mind now, when I say our neighbors, I don't mean the hull on 'em, not him nor the young ones, they wus well enough in their way; but her, Mrs. Possumnose.

The Possumnoses hed lived near neighbors to us nigh onto a year before we got properly acquainted with them. That is to say, I'd called [illegible]

[illegible]

As her underhanded ways an' tricks showed plainer to my sight, I got so I disliked her more an' more. I used to fetch deep sighs whenever I see her a comin' toward the house. Seemed as ef I'd give worlds to shake her off an' be free from her sneakin' and peekin' an' tattlin', but 'twas as ef I couldn't never find the right way nor time, bein' natterally of a timid disposition an' afraid to stand up for myself.

But as the old sayin' is, there's a end to all things, an' the end to Mrs. Possumnose's mischiefmakin' to our house warn't fur off.

A friend o' Seth's from the city came a visitin' to our house. He warn't no relation, but Seth hed knowed him for for some time, an' when he was to the city last he'd gin him a invite to come an' stay a few days.

This Mr. Reynolds was a lol'able fine-lookin' man, 'though not by enny means what ye'd call han'sum, an' he hed city breedin' about him, that is, a kind o' easy, polished way that sot natteral upon him an' showed off to good advantage. Besides he hed a sight o' book larnin,' Mr. Reynolds hed, an' a amazin' pleasin' way o' talkin'.

Me an' Seth enjoyed his company an' done all we could to make his stay agree'ble to him.

The very night he got here Mrs. Possumnose popped in purtendin' to be in a dretful hurry, she hed come to borrow my rollin' pin, she said, 'cause she'd broke the handle off'n hern. She followed me into the buttery, so's to see what I'd baked up, stopped to look into the front room to see ef there warn't a speck o' dust to be seen, an' out she shooted in hot haste, 'cause jest then Seth drew up; he'd been to the deepo arter Mr. Reynolds. She wouldn't hev him see her for the world, she said.

Wall, his visit come to a end an' the very afternoon o' the day he left us, Mrs. Possumnose come a visitin' to our house.

Charlevoix Sentinel.

Established, 1869.

WILLARD A. SMITH, Editor.

CHARLEVOIX, JAN. 18, 1888.

Where are all the anarchists, who were making such a racket a few weeks ago?

New York Tribune: Perhaps the President wants the tariff taken off raw material so as to give his English free trade message a chance. It was about the rawest material we have seen for some time.

Buffalo Bill has struck it so rich in London that his Wild West show has become a fixture in England, and the papers are filled with descriptions of a colossal building erected at Manchester, especially for Bill and his Indians.

Oh, yes, the Cleveland administration is popular in its way: Democratic majority in Forty-eighth Congress, 83; Democratic majority in Forty-ninth Congress, 43; Democratic majority in Fiftieth Congress, 15. Yes, it is popular.

John Sherman's tariff plan is so simple as not to need explanation, and is so conclusive as to be unassailable. He says: "Let come in free everything we cannot make. Put a duty on that which we can make, so that the American manufacturer can pay his workmen better wages than are paid in Europe."

In the savings banks of the country there is deposited the neat little sum of $1,333,000,000, representing the little savings of about 1,000,000 men, women and children. This is a surplus that nobody be alarmed about. It shows that the working people of this country not only have wages enough to live better than those of any other country, but can put some money away for a rainy day.

Turkey is still nominally Russia's debtor to the extent of a little matter of $37,000,000, being the balance of the indemnity exacted by the Czar at the close of the late war. The Czar now orders the Sultan to settle, with the alternative of relinquishing a vast tract of territory in Asia Minor as the penalty of refusal. The Sultan hasn't got any money, and it is extremely improbable that he would hand it over to the Czar if he had. He has just issued a call for 50,000 additional troops, and, if it comes to a question of pay or fight, Europe is inclined to think it will be fight.

Diplomacy has a very pretty complication to unravel at Samoa. The Germans seized the island last summer, and put a king of their own on the cocoanut throne. The rightful Coco appealed to gods and men to undo the wrong. One of our tars seems to have begun the good work. A German jostled him on the streets of Apia, and like a son of the Bird of Freedom, our tar at once knocked the Tueton down. Now, according to precedent, unless the President and Mr. Bayard at once send humble apologies to Bismarck, with a solacing indemnity for the knocked down personage, a German fleet will come into New York harbor, as it did into the Samoa bay, depose Cleveland and appoint some pro-Bismarck President, preparatory to annexing this country to Prussia. That's the Samoa precedent, in a few words.

Milwaukee Wisconsin: Andrew J. Seymour, the psychological wonder, gave some demonstrations of his quality recently, in the shape of what he calls a driving test. A committee of unprejudiced citizens got into a carriage and drove up the avenue to Grover's drug store, southwest corner Grand Avenue and Sixth street, where they hid the object. Meantime Mr. Seymour remained at the museum. The object was an "I. X. L." dagger, which was picked up covered with blood on a Missouri battle field. It was hid under Mr. Grover's west counter, between a bottle of Hunyadi water and a piece of castile soap. Then the committee went back to the museum. Mr. Seymour blindfolded himself and began his preliminary work with one of the committee. With his right hand touching the nape of the subject's neck, and the left grasping his hand so tightly that the thumbs intertwined, the mind reader gave direction for the concentration of the subject's mind first on the direction where the knife was hid, then on the street or avenue, and finally on the number of the house. In this he located the object at 601 Grand Avenue. He then was blindfolded and drove the carriage containing the committee to the store in question, once narrowly escaping a collision with a street car, and again with an oil tank. It is needless to say he spotted the knife without any difficulty. A number of small boys followed the procession, giving vent to hideous cries, which attracted some attention. Mr. Seymour said it was his sixty-third driving test, and that he had never yet met with an accident.

Northern Michigan News.

Bellaire is organizing a Post of Sons of Veterans.

St. Ignace resumed business, having negotiated a $2,000 loan.

Wm. Zorn and family will move from Bellaire to Eastport soon. He contemplates starting a drug store at that place.

Local prohibition petitions are circulating rapidly and widely in Mecosta county, and a prominent citizen says the saloons must go.

A Petoskey man advertised "Boy Wanted," and in less than two weeks there were twin boys at his house. You can never make him believe that advertising doesn't pay.

The funds to secure the right of way for Ward's Alba railroad have all been raised except fifty or sixty dollars, and the people propose to raise that by holding dances in the town hall.

The Bellaire Accident Association has about completed its works of incorporation. Any one desiring to see the constitution, or to find out other particulars, should call on Fred H. Zorn.

The Algomah got stuck in the ice of the Straits one day last week, and remained there until next day, with ice under and all around her. Navigation across the straits is extremely difficult.

At a special election held at Frankfort one day last week for the purpose of settling the question of bonding the village for $10,000 for water works, the proposition carried by a majority of 50.

Mancelona Herald: Work on the new dish factory is progressing as fast as the weather will permit. The frame of the lathe department is already up, and the saw-mill is running both night and day.

Thomas Wilson lost three horses and a sleighload of supplies while crossing on the ice from St. Ignace to Cheneaux Islands. He barely escaped drowning by jumping from the sleigh before it sank.

Al. E. Peck, of Petoskey, late with Maxwell's troupe, is to run the amusement business in Petoskey this winter, and promises at least a play a week with home talent, beside attractions from outside.

A Sault Ste. Marie citizen by the name of Brown is going to see how it seems to travel after the matter of ye olden time. He'll make the trip to Grand Haven, a distance of 300 miles or more, with an old-fashioned sleigh, drawn by a team of dogs.

The Oval Wood Dish factory is to be rebuilt at Mancelona, the citizens donating the proprietors $5,000 to assist in the work, of which sum the G. R. & I. R. R. Co. gave $500. Other towns offered as high as $10,000 and $15,000 to secure the institution.

Five prisoners broke jail at Sault Ste. Marie recently, by sawing off the bars of the cage and concealing themselves until the door was opened by the guard, when they fled. One of them was caught at the Canadian Sault and rushed back across the river.

Will Zorn, assistant postmaster at Cheboygan, has been discharged by Postmaster Gallagher, the latter alleging that on several occasions has appropriated money from the mails. A thorough investigation will be made. Considerable surprise is manifested over the matter at Cheboygan.

The republican Congressional Convention has been called to be held at Ishpeming, Jan. 25th. There are to be 91 delegates in the convention of which Grand Traverse has 7, Leelanaw 4, and Benzie 3, a total of 14 for the lower counties, which does not give them a great deal of weight in the convention.

S. F. Hodge & Co. of Detroit, have the contract for building a compound engine for the new palatial steamer being built at Bay City by F. W. Wheeler as a companion for the Minnie M., on the Cheboygan and "Soo" route. These two boats will make the "Soo" route the daisy route for pleasure tourists the coming season.

To-day occurs the great event of the season at the Soo. It will be a grand celebration of the completion of the railroads to the booming burg and of the international bridge. Leading citizens of Minneapolis, Duluth, Toronto, Montreal and other cities, as well as from neighboring towns are expected to be present. Preparation are being made to make it a successful affair.

Lately Burr Delamarter, George Delamarter, George Greggs, George Betts and another man started with a team from Bois Blanc Island to go to Cheboygan on the ice. It proved a perilous trip. Their team broke through twice and was rescued with difficulty each time. The men all were more or less watered and were greatly rejoiced when they succeeded in reaching terra firma.

Traverse Bay Eagle: The editor [E. L. Sprague,] wishes to return his sincere thanks to the friends through whose influence he was appointed Postmaster at Traverse City, and also for the many kind words and hearty congratulations he has received. He hopes and will endeavor to perform the duties of the office in such a manner as to retain the confidence and good feeling expressed.

W. D. Marks, superintendent of the Michigan state fish hatchery at Paris, Mecosta county, says: "We have now in the house 2,000,000 brook trout eggs, which will be ready to place in the streams by the first of March. All having brook trout streams in Michigan must get in their orders at once to secure a supply. Remember, only the nice spring brooks are planted. A good test of the water is, is it fit to drink in summer? If so it will do for trout."

The Episcopal mission established at Petoskey a year ago, is growing vigorously. The Rev. C. T. Stout took charge of the mission in September last, and under his ministrations the little church is filled every Sunday. Steps are already being taken to purchase a lot, and erect a suitable church edifice.——Petoskey feels justly proud of her improvements — her water-works, electric lights, etc. She also has a new and expensive snowplow, but owing to a lack of funds to run it, it is kept in reserve to exhibit to summer resorters, and the Petoskians plod to church in Indian file, after the manner of the original settlers.

East Jordan Enterprise: Wm. Mears, of Boyne Falls, has a full crew of men and teams working in and out of the woods.——W. G. Pierce and wife have returned to their home in Waterloo, N. Y.——E. A. H. Cole has returned from his trip through the West. He reports very cold weather and roads blocked with snow in Iowa and Minnesota, and says we ought to be happy here even if the snow is deep.——Prof. Allen has finished an inch and a quarter object glass with which can be discerned the rings of Saturn and the moons of Jupiter.——Uncle Jonas Bowman is very sick.

The great flour train, from Minneapolis, the first to cross the international bridge arrived at the "Soo" on the 9th. The train was divided into six sections, all arriving and passing the bridge safely. The train consisted of 102 cars of flour, loaded at Minneapolis and bound for New York and Boston via the Soo line and Canadian Pacific Railroad. The cars were all decorated, and each was adorned with an inscription appropriate to the occasion. The cars were greeted with great cheers by the crowds of Soo people who gathered to witness the arrival. No event ever created more enthusiasm at the Sault than did this. The Canadians welcomed the train on the other side, and the whole town turned out to see it.

A singular character died on Mackinac Island at the beginning of last week ... [illegible] ... shores of Lake Michigan, as far as Chicago, in a large open row boat, gathering furs, there were no steamboats in those days on Lake Michigan, and Chicago was a dreary swamp. "Old Joe" died on the day he had completed his 92d year, and it is a singular fact that the event took place on the very day of the very year that he had thousands of times set for his death. For the last few years of his life he lived in a small wooden hut on Market street, and spent all his time rocking himself in a chair and crooning snatches of old French voyageur songs.

Petoskey Record: Our earnest and energetic citizen, Gen. A. C. Litchfield, purposes to go to Washington at an early day to confer with the Michigan delegation relative to the establishment of a naval station at Harbor Springs, and advocate the measure with congressman generally as one of great importance. He claims that, in addition to being the finest harbor on the lakes, and the one easiest of access in all kinds of weather for vessels of any draught of water, it is so far removed from foreign waters or settlement, and can be so easily protected from the natural fortifications which surround it, as to make it apparent to any disinterested person, that Harbor Springs, in preference to all other ports, is the place for such a station.——Mr. A. J. Southard, merchant, miller, and banker, of Harbor Springs, failed last week, the event being precipitated by an attachment got out by Capt. Philo Crysler, who had $2,700 deposited in his bank. Other attachments followed, and the smash is complete. It is said to have been impending for a long time, as the depreciation of real estate left on his hands by the failure of Parker several years ago, kept piling up a load upon him until it got too heavy to be borne. From all we can gather we think the general public opinion exonerates M. Southard from intentionally bringing loss upon his creditors.——We are in receipt of a circular from Frank A. Robbins, proprietor of the winter circus in New York City, saying that the entire show as now exhibited in New York will visit Petoskey next summer. He will have a complete menagerie and one hundred performers in a double ring.

QUEER YARNS ABOUT EDISON.

"A ranchman came along on his way to Rawlins for a doctor to see his daughter, who appeared to have been suddenly affected by some peculiar disease, the cause and nature of which puzzled and alarmed the family, who were evidently simple and well-meaning but ignorant people. ... Dr. French of Philadelphia was there, and volunteered to accompany the man. So he climbed into the buckboard and the mules were turned ranchward again.

"Several hours later the doctor, who was a great believer in efficacy of electricity as a medical agent, returned and described the case to us.

"The girl, who was about 17 years old and very beautiful in a rude sort of way, had been standing at a sink washing dishes when she had suddenly leaned forward and remained so, in a kind of cataleptic condition, until her mother came to her, probably an hour later.

"She had seemed all right afterward and could not explain exactly how she had been seized. Afterwards, another day, the same thing had occurred as she stood hanging out clothes. She had remained with her arms uplifted, in one position, till she had been brought away and aroused. But the occasion which most seriously alarmed them, and which had caused the father to bring a physician, was that she had lain down and been found in this stupid condition, from which they had failed to arouse her.

"Dr. French had worked over her an hour and a half before she recovered the possession of consciousness. But he asserted if he had a medical electric battery he could have restored her immediately.

At this Edison became quite excited, and declared if he could get some old cells and a coil from the operator he could provide the necessary current. So Edison rigged up a rude kind of battery ... [illegible]

OCEAN DISASTER.

Twenty-five Lives Lost in Waterford Harbor.

A LONDON dispatch says that an 1,900-ton bark, believed to be an American vessel, has been wrecked at the entrance of Waterford (Ireland) harbor. Her crew, consisting of twenty-five persons, were drowned. The vessel is supposed to be the ship Eureka, Capt. Southard, which sailed from San Francisco Aug. 10 for Queenstown with a cargo of wheat, and which ran by Queenstown in a gale. A violent hurricane has been raging in the Irish Channel. Great damage was done to property and shipping. A large vessel was wrecked off Dunmanon, and all hands are believed to be lost.

The Indictments Against the Six Defendants in Court Dismissed.

A SIOUX CITY (Iowa) dispatch says that "States Attorney Marsh made a motion to dismiss the Haddock murder indictments against all the defendants except Peters, Platt, and Treiber, who have never yet been arrested, and who are believed to have escaped to Germany. The motion was sustained by the court. This motion released all the other seven of the defendants except Munchrath, who has been convicted of manslaughter, and against whom the indictment for conspiracy is kept hanging. The defendants released are Arensdorf, Leader, Sherman, Granda, Leavitt, and Koschniski."

A Newspaper Man's Divorce.

THE domestic troubles of Fred D. Mussey, the Washington correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, and his wife, Anna E., a daughter of ex-Governor Foster of Ohio, have culminated in a suit for divorce. Mr. Mussey and Miss Foster were married during the first term of Governor Foster, the plaintiff at the time being private secretary to his Excellency. The marriage proved to be an uncongenial one, and the couple separated after a few months of married life.

The Majority and Minority Reports of the Pacific Railroad Commissioners.

A Funding of the Debt Due the Government at Three Per Cent. Recommended.

[Washington special.]

The reports of the Pacific Railway Commission have been given out for publication. There are two reports to the President, one signed by Commissioners Anderson and Littler and the other by Commissioner Pattison. The majority report consists of 130 pages. The larger part is a history of the roads and of the Government's financial interest in them, together with copious references to the testimony taken and severe strictures upon certain indicated perversions of their trusts by Gould, Sage, and other former directors of the Union Pacific, and by Stanford, Huntington, Crocker, and Hopkins of the Central Pacific. The report first takes up the Union Pacific system, whose obligation to the Government is shown to be $50,171,993.36. The total funded debt of the system, Dec. 31, 1886, was $81,369,127.60 (exclusive of its obligation to the United States), of which $33,532,091 was prior to the United States statutory lien. To secure the payment of this sum and interest, the commission offer a bill providing for a mortgage upon which the Union Pacific Company, for the first ten years, will pay the sum of $1,776,135 annually, this being 3 per cent on [illegible] to bear upon Congress, and possibly the President. Such an organization does not seem very necessary, as the repeal of most or all the tobacco taxes looks like a foregone conclusion, but the matter is of so much importance to the people of North Carolina that they will take no chances.

A YEAR OF GREAT BUSINESS.

Enormous Amount of Traffic in the Country During the Last Season.

Decrease in Railway Earnings—Unsatisfactory Results in Some Lines of Trade.

[From Dun & Co.'s Review of Business.]

The dying year has seen 12,724 miles of railway finished, making the mileage for the United States 150,710; but changes of freight rates at the West tend steadily downward, lessening the prospect for building next year. The Pennsylvania Company reports a decrease of $179,000 in net earnings for November, and the Erie a decrease of $24,233. The iron industry, after the largest year's output on record, is rapidly cutting down production, prices, and, at many points, wages. Since March the average of all grades at Philadelphia has declined $1.42, and of rails $6. Sales of 20,000 tons Alabama and Tennessee iron are reported, but no sales of rails, for which [illegible]

The commercial history of Chicago for the year 1887 presents many interesting features. The total trade of the year reached the enormous sum of $1,103,000,000, being a gain of about 10½ per cent. over 1886. The banks did an unusually prosperous business, nearly all of them making larger profits than in any preceding year in their history.

THE INTERSTATE LAW.

Are Express Men Amenable?—The Whole Question to Be Referred to Congress.

While Many of the Provisions Apply to Them, the Commissioners Are in Doubt.

[Washington special.]

The formal decision of the Inter-State Commerce Commission upon the question whether the express companies are subject to the provisions of the act to regulate commerce was announced Thursday. The Commission, after describing the different organizations doing express business, says there is nothing in the nature of the business which prevents its being carried on by an ordinary partnership or even by an individual, provided the necessary contracts can be made with the transportation lines. The most usual contract is one which pays to the railroad company 40 per cent of the gross receipts of the express company, but various other methods of settlement are employed. The fact that express companies perform many other services besides transporting property, such as the collection of debts, etc., is not regarded as a reason why the act should not be treated as applying to their business as common carriers, since many railroads also have other business besides that of transportation.

New Year's Sermon by the Rev. Dr. Talmage.

In This World We Get No Idea of the Extent and Glory of Heaven—Eye Hath Not Seen Nor Ear Heard Anything Like the Advancing Splendors.

BROOKLYN, Jan. 1.—At the Tabernacle this morning the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., announced that next Sabbath he will begin a course of sermons to the women of America, with practical hints for men, the following subjects among others.

"The Women Who Have to Fight the Battles of Life Alone," "Marriage for Worldly Success, without Reference to Moral Character," "Is Engagement as Binding as Marriage?" "Women Who Are Already Uncongenially Married," "Influences Abroad for the Destruction of Women," "Wifely Ambition Right and Wrong," "What Kind of Men Women Should Avoid," "Simplicity as Opposed to Affectation," "Reformation in Dress," "Plain Women," "The Female Skeptic," and "Christian Housewifery."

This morning Dr. Talmage's subject was: "The Coming Glory;" his text, I Corinthians ii, 9: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him." He said: Eighteen [illegible]

John bids us look again and we see thrones; thrones of the prophets, thrones of the patriarchs, thrones of the angels, thrones of the apostles, thrones of the martyrs, throne of Jesus, throne of God. And we turn round to see the glory and it is thrones! thrones! thrones!

John bids us look again, and we see the great procession of the redeemed passing: Jesus, on a white horse, leads the march, and all the armies of Heaven following on white horses. Infinite cavalcade passing, passing; empires pressing into line, ages following ages. Dispensation tramping on after dispensation. Glory in the track of glory. Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America pressing into line. Islands of the sea, shoulder to shoulder. Generations before the flood following generations after the flood, and as Jesus rises at the head of that great host and waves his sword in signal of victory, all crowns are lifted, and all ensigns flung out, and all chimes rung, and all hallelujahs chanted, and some cry: "Glory to God most high," and some, "Hosanna to the son of David;" and some, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain"—till all exclamations of endearment and homage in the vocabulary of Heaven are exhausted, and there comes up surge after surge of "Amen! amen! and amen!" "Eye hath not seen it, ear hath not heard it."

old songs sung it seems as if all the old country meeting-houses joined in the chorus, and city church and sailors' bethel and Western cabins, until the whole continent lifts the doxology and the scepters of eternity beat time to the music. Away, then, with your starveling tunes that chill the devotions of the sanctuary and make the people sit silent when Jesus is marching on to victory. When generals come back from victorious wars, don't we cheer them and shout, "Huzza! huzza!" and when Jesus passes along in the conquest of the earth, shall we not have for Him one loud, ringing cheer?

All hail the power of Jesus' name!
Let angels prostrate fall.
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown Him Lord of all.

But, my friends, if music on earth is so sweet, what will it be in Heaven? They all know the tune there. All the best singers of all ages will join it—choirs of white-robed children, choirs of patriarchs, choirs of apostles. Morning stars clapping their symbals. Harpers with their harps. Great anthems of God, roll on! roll on!—other empires joining the harmony till the thrones are all full and the nations all saved. Anthem shall touch anthem, chorus join chorus, and all the sweet sounds of earth and Heaven be poured into the ear of Christ. David of the harp will be there. Gabriel of the trumpet will be there. Germany, redeemed, will pour its deep bass voice into the song, and Africa will add to the music with her matchless voice.

YOUNG VOTERS, ATTENTION!

Concise Statement of the Position Each Party Sustains Toward the Government.

What the Democratic Party Has Been in the Past It Remains to This Day.

[From the New York Tribune.]

Thousands of young men are asking the question put by a correspondent in the following letter:

To the Editor of the Tribune—SIR: Will you please inform me what is the difference between a Republican and a Democrat? Next year I shall be of age and shall cast my first vote.

A VETERAN'S SON.

It is the same difference essentially which has existed in the past between a Democrat and a Federalist, or between a Democrat and a Whig. From the foundation of the government there have been two parties, one of which has desired less and the other more legislation on constructive issues of National reform and progress. The Federalists desired to arm the National Government with requisite authority over the States so as to insure its preservation. The Federalist Secretary of the Treasury, Alexander Hamilton, proposed in one of his earliest reports a comprehensive scheme for the development of home industries [illegible] them, and who will vote for anything that has the Democratic brand on it.

Of course the last class is the most numerous, though the third embraces a very large number. There are thousands of sincere but mistaken voters who are now inclined to vote with the Democrats on this issue, because they do not understand it clearly. Here is work to do which must be done, and that promptly. The people must be aroused to the actual danger that menaces us when the chief executive of the land devotes his entire message to this one issue, and practically demands of his party friends in Congress that they shall put his recommendation into the form of law.

Let no Republican waste one word upon the Eastern mugwumps. They are free traders, almost to the last man. Their feeling for Cleveland will now increase almost to the point of idolatry. They will vote as he directs, and they are definitely lost to the Republicans.

But the change in the situation gives us the certainty of carrying New Jersey and Connecticut on the tariff issue, and New York also. The State, outside the city, is strongly Republican and Protectionist. Now let the hundred of thousands of wage-wagers in New York city and Brooklyn have demonstrated to them clearly the fact that the striking down of the tariff means lower wages, less work, dull times, stagnation, want and suffering, and the Empire State will roll up a majority for protection that will paralyze the President.

The Democrats claim that they will carry [illegible]

INTRODUCTORY.

There is a little ship to be descried in the twilight of the early morning out upon a boisterous sea, and there is heard a quick, sharp cry of alarm. Straightway there comes an answering word of cheer, as if a father had spoken to his frightened child in the night. The disciples, fresh from the mountain-side feast and hurrying across by their Master's command to the other side, are cast into the midst of a storm and realize once again and in a new and vivid way their dependence upon him; and he, walking the waves to their deliverance, proves once again and in a new and wondrous way how graciously, willingly and able he is to save. "Of a truth," we may say with them, "thou art the Son of God." The place is the Sea of Galilee, not far from Capernaum, and the time is the spring or early summer of A. D. 28, the third and last year of our Lord's ministry.

WHAT THE LESSON SAYS.

22. Straightway. There was a call for "the King," and an intense excitement over the royal miracle of the loaves and fishes in which, no doubt, the disciples joined, but Christ paused not to humor it. The word "straightway" is omitted by Tischendorf.——Constrained. The root word means necessity. He persuaded his disciples of the imperative requirements of the step.——Other side. It is a modification of the Greek word used here, peran, that gives a name to the parts beyond Jordan, Perea.——Sent away. Literally, dismissed or loosed the multitude. Seemingly requiring his word in order to be set free.

23. A mountain, or the mountain. Into one of the high and quiet recesses of the hill over against the sea.——Apart. By himself. Alone with God, as later in Gethsemane (Matt. 26: 36) and earlier in the Horns of Hattin (Luke 6: 12).——The evening. The second evening or twilight, about six o'clock. The earlier evening was mentioned in verse 15.

24. Now. After a few hours sailing on rough water.——In the midst. Not necessarily in the middle; but in mid course, on the high seas.——Tossed. Literally tortured, put to the severest test. The expression was first used of rubbing on the whetstone.——Contrary. Greek, Enantios. In their face. They were going in the teeth of the wind. Dr. Broadus in a footnote to his late commentary tells of a similar personal experience with the treacherous winds of Galilee, when crossing from this same point.

25. Fourth watch. From six p. m. to six a. m. equals twelve hours of the technical [illegible]

Contagious Diseases in Childhood.

The most common and important of such diseases are whooping-cough, measles, scarlet fever, and diphtheria. They are all to be avoided if possible, and in relation to them the parent should guard the children from exposure. Maintain in them that degree of vigorous health which both lessens the liability to take the disease and more readily triumphs over it, if taken; and keep the house, from cellar to garret, and all its surroundings, as free as possible from all noxious miasms—mainly by absolute cleanliness, by free circulation of air, by unobstructed sunshine, and by a copious use of good disinfectants.

Though whooping-cough is seldom fatal, it is best to call in a physician, for he can lessen the severity of the paroxysms, shorten the term of the disease and prevent its running off into a protracted and exhausting cough, as it too often does.

Measles are apt to be treated as a trifling affair, and, indeed, many parents purposely expose their children to the disease; but, owing to carelessness in treating it, more die of it than die of diphtheria or scarlet fever. Besides it often leaves permanent harm behind. Though the disease is generally lighter in childhood, yet the susceptibility to it is much diminished in adult life.

Measles begin as a cold, with a running at the eyes and nose, and the rash in dark red spots, first seen on the face and forehead.

Scarlet fever commences with a sore throat, and the rash appears as a general redness of the skin, and shows itself first about the neck and chest.

Diphtheria begins with marked weakness, and the inflammation in the back part of the mouth soon has a peculiar smell, as of putrid meat.

In no case should either of these diseases be trusted to home treatment. While the physician looks after the cure of the patient, the friends should actively co-operate in preventing the spread of the disease, not only in the whole matter of disinfection, but in completely isolating the child until the possibility of communicating infection is over.

Some forms of ophthalmia (inflammation of the eyes) are very contagious, and may be communicated from child to child at school. Teachers should be on the lookout in this matter. It is mostly prevalent among the poor.

It would be well if, at our public schools, during a period of infectious disease, the girls were cautioned about the habit of putting on each other's hoods and hats, and of frequent hugging and kissing. Infectious diseases are often thus propagated.—Youth's Companion.

WILLARD A. SMITH, Editor.

CHARLEVOIX, JAN. 18, 1888.

FROM THE PACIFIC.

Will See Writes the Sentinel From the Golden State.

BURBANK, Cala., Jan. 1, 1888.

To the Editor,

You remember I promised to write you, and being a man of my word, I will attempt to tell you a little about this land of sunshine and flowers.

Well, I found Frank Craine here, and doing well; also Messrs. Faulkner and Messmore, both of whom I think you have met. I found this country looking more bare and brown than I had expected, but when one thinks that at the season I came here there had not been a drop of rain for eight months, one would not expect to find green grass without any irrigation. Where water had been used freely could be found the most beautiful lawns and flower gardens I ever saw.

I took a walk with Frank out in the northwest part of the city, where we found plenty of orange trees, some loaded with fruit, and some just in blossom. That was the latter part of October. We made a trip to Santa Monica, the ocean resort for Los Angeles, and found a very pleasant place; fine for both bathing and driving, and there were a great many indulging in both.

The harbor for Los Angeles is at present at San Pedro, but some capitalists are trying to make one near Santa Monica. Some parts of Los Angeles is very fine, there being large dwellings and fine lawns and shade trees which are green the whole year; but the old Spanish part of the city looks very "tumble-down," as does also the Chinese part. But the way fires have been going that part of the city will soon be swept away.

There are two railroads running into the city, the Santa Fee and the Southern Pacific, both of which are doing a heavy business. Los Angeles is located in a valley, but the most desirable building locations are on the hills, so that is where the finest residences are found. As you are well aware, everybody in this country is wild over real estate, and only for my nerves I should be driven to do something desperate—say, for example, invest fifteen or twenty dollars, provided I could borrow that amount.

We took a trip up into the mountains and had a fine day of it. About half way to the top we found a little open park, and an elderly man who was afflicted with nervousness (more severe than our old friend at home.) He has a little home up there, where he has a garden and some very nice, cool water, which we both partook of freely. I have learned since that he is a son of John Brown, of Harper's Ferry renown.

Well, I have not looked around this country much, and am not able to tell you very much about it; but if you, or any of your friends, have any money that you want to invest, if you will send it to me I feel sure I can make you wear smiles within three months. Men who do not double their money here every three months get discouraged and talk of going where they can make something.

I met Capt. Snyder, late of the propeller Cummings, in the city last week; also Daniel B. Jerme. I hear from home often, both by letter and paper, and although a long way from the little town away up in Northern Michigan, I don't want you people to think you have got rid of me for keeps, for though this is a fine country in winter, I don't know how the summer will be.

Well, Brother Smith, feeling that this will prove punishment enough for your readers, I wish you and them a happy and prosperous year. It seems very little like New Year here, with vegetation just beginning to look green after the late rain.

Yours very truly,

WILL SEE.

THE RAILROAD.

What Chief Engineer Beardslee, in a Recent Interview, Says Of It.

Engineer Beardslee, of the D. C. & E. R. Co., is putting in his time, these days of cold and snow, is getting his books and maps ready for an active renewal of operations on the line when the fiat goes forth from headquarters.

Our scribe cornered the gentleman one evening last week, and he cheerfully submitted to an interview. Of course, the first question asked was:

"Mr. Beardslee, will the road be built?"

"Yes sir! Mr. Cherrie is in New York, and has with him the documents completing the conditions upon which the funds are to be furnished by the New York syndicate. I expect to hear from him this week or next, and expect to receive orders to proceed with the work."

"Then the right of way between Charlevoix and Kalkaska is all secured."

"Yes, practically. Only two cases yet remain—John Walker, in South Arm, and the Charlevoix Summer Resort."

"How will you disposes of these cases?"

"We shall condemn. I do not deem these obstacles worth considering."

"What will be the nature of your next operations?"

"Work of the engineer corps upon cross-sections — that is, the survey establishing the width, and curves, and by which we ascertain and compute the quantity of earth to be removed. And there will probably be necessary minor changes to be made in the line. There is much engineering work yet to be done — in fact, it will continue through all the departments of the work. The engineer corps will, when the work is well under way, be divided into five different parties, working on different sections of the line; that is, providing the whole distance from Kalkaska to Mackinac should be built next summer."

"How soon can the Charlevoix and Kalkaska part of the line be constructed?"

"I can have the road bed ready for the iron in 40 days from the time the first blow is struck."

"With what force?"

"About 900 men, to say nothing of 200 men with 50 teams to supply the ties. It would require, to do the work in the time I have stated, 200 men for clearing; 200 for grubbing, and 500 for grading."

"What about the item of ties for the road?"

"Well, I apprehend there will be some difficulty in getting ties as rapidly as they will be required. The Company have decided to procure the ties along the line, and we shall want 309,000 of them between Charlevoix and Kalkaska. What kind of ties shall we use? Well, I prefer hemlock, black ash and tamarack; they are better than cedar, although we may use some cedar."

"Do you think the northern extension will proceed next season?"

"Such is the intention, I believe."

"Has the progress of the work thus far been as satisfactory as you could wish?"

"Yes. In my railroading experience of over twenty years, I have never been engaged in a work where everything moved along as smoothly and rapidly as in this."

"What about bridging the upper channel?"

"My plans contemplate the construction of an iron draw-bridge, to cost about $10,000. A combination wood and iron bridge can be built for $8,000. That matter has not yet been decided."

"What about the depot locations here, Mr. Beardslee?"

"The passenger depot will probably be located on Pine Lake at the foot of Newman street. That is the location selected in our plans. In that vicinity, probably cornering on the bridge, we shall build a dock, 100 by 600 feet, upon which we shall place our freight warehouse, making it accessible by side-track on one side, and to navigation on the other."

"What commercial effect, in your opinion, will the completion of this road have upon Charlevoix?"

"I think Charlevoix will be the best town on this shore of Lake Michigan. Its facilities for manufacturing enterprises are unsurpassed, and the magnificent harbor here will prove a most valuable auxiliary to the road. There is no question about the future of Charlevoix. These views I have expressed in a letter to New York, which President Cherrie took with him. You may state that I consider this one of the most promising railroad projects in the State, and one which will perform wonders in the development of Northern Michigan. It will be a through line, and will secure an extensive traffic. Another important item concerning Charlevoix should not be lost sight of: This is a point on the line naturally adapted to the requirements of the general car and repair shops. It is about half way between Kalkaska and the straits, and is in every way just the place for the shops which the company must build somewhere on the line. Shall I recommend it? Most certainly. Yes, the benefit to Charlevoix will begin with the inauguration of the work. It will furnish employment for every idle man, and naturally stimulate every branch of trade."

The "General" yawned, and the scribe departed to his den. A fact which gives coloring to Mr. B.'s opinions is the fact that he will be the permanent Engineer-in-Chief of the road, with Charlevoix as his headquarters. He is thoroughly interested in the work, and very positive in his opinions as to its future importance among the railroad systems of the State."

—At an adjourned meeting of the Charlevoix Business Men's Association held Monday evening, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, L. D. Bartholomew; Vice President, J. L. Hurd; Secretary, R. W. Kane; Treasurer, W. A. Brown; Executive Committee, the President, Secretary, Treasurer, A. E. Mason and A. T. Washburn. The Association voted to give a banquet on Monday evening, Jan. 30th.

THE WORLD MOVES.

What is Being Done for the Improvement of the Methods of Education.

For the Sentinel.

When Galileo made the declaration, "The World Moves," he had reference to astronomical problems of that age, but little understood, but which have since become matters of fact.

And when is is said again "The World Moves," the expression has a different meaning. It indicates a revolution in the mind of man relative to matters of educational import.

It is evident, from recent changes in the law in relation to this question, that a new era has dawned — an era which opens new fields of thought connected with this important question. And from the spirit evinced by those having control of this matter may be gathered this fact: That our educational methods need revision and improvement. Though that improvement may not come all at once, it will come as soon as teachers can be found whose whole life and soul enter into the true spirit of educating the young.

Education means, simply, to draw out or develop; and the whole question develops right here: What has to be developed or drawn out? Certainly not our selfish propensities, which are so easily stimulated, but those parts of our nature which go to build up feelings of good fellowship—having a tendency to form habits of doing the right thing at the right time, and otherwise building up habits which tend to civilize and socialize, curbing avarice and stimulating benevolence, moderating our arrogance and ostentation; cultivating our modesty and humility, so essential in the practical affairs of life, but so little cared for in the education of the young. The science of the improvement of man is less understood than that of any man under domestication. We have paid more attention to the pedigree of the horse than that of man, who stands at the head of the organic world; and our civilization to-day, measured by its results, testifies to a lack of equilibrium of the individual — an actual deficiency in the proper methods of training or developing character calculated to produce results upon which to base a harmonious civilization.

But there is hope that in the near future things will be different. A change of methods, especially where self-interests come in conflict, come very slowly.

Although Newton lived nearly 40 years after the publication of his Principia, he had not outside of England, over 40 defenders of his immortal work at the time of his death. Leibnitz declared that "Newton had robbed the Almighty of some of his noblest attributes, and sapped the foundation of natural religion." Yet the grandeur of that incomparable work is the wonder of the world. It is accepted as the text-book of the world regarding the government of the Universe by immutable and universal law.

We repeat, "The World Moves" upward and onward to a higher plane of thought, and a purer and better civilization.

Truly yours,

WILLIAM BLACK.

Several Harbor Springs and Petoskey Indians are in Washington looking up the interests of their tribe. A recent special has this concerning them: The delegation of Fisher's Indians was reinforced to-day by Mr. S. V. Shibergost of Emmet county. Frank Wason who appears to be the leader of the delegation, saw Mr. Fisher last night and made an appointment with him to meet his brother braves at the capitol at noon to-day. At the appointed hour there was a picturesque scene in the corridor of the house. Frank and Jonas Wason and Simon and Charles Kizigugose were drawn up in line leaning against the wall for support. Mr. Shibergost "set up" the cigars, which had a flavor of their own and the Michigan [illegible] prepared to maintain there right to appeal if it took them a week. Wason sent a card to Mr. Fisher, who was conveniently absent again. Then the council met and talked over the situation in choice Ottawa. They sent in again at 1 o'clock. No Fisher. Again at 2 they tried it. Still no success. At 4 they were still supporting the wall, and Mr. Fisher's seat was still cold. M. Shibbergost says that they will watch every approach to the hall until they nab Mr. Fisher. They will probably have to wait at least a week, as Mr. Fisher seems back ward.

The sheriff of the county has failed to serve the writ and the secretary of state proposes to see that it is done this time without fail. They say that in the secretary of state's office that there are three good ways of dodging the law. It was framed to regulate the taxation of mortgage investments. The only concern felt in the office is that the law has compelled the state board of auditors to buy some $8,000 worth of books which, it is prescribed, the supervisors were to obtain from the secretary's office, and to use in a specified manner. It is, therefore, the business of the secretary of state to see that the books are taken. Mr. Osmun doesn't care what the supreme court does, but until it decides the law null and void his duty is clearly to see that it is obeyed, and he proposes to do so.

"THE INHOSPITABLE CLIMATE."

Work of the Deadly Blizzard's Breath in the Northwest.

In spite of the seeming severity of the recent storm in this locality, the reports that come from other sections of our state and country, should cause us to be extremely thankful that we escaped with such a comparatively light and harmless visitation.

From Minnesota, Dakota, Nebraska, Iowa, Wisconsin, Montana, Missouri and even from Texas, and throughout the west and southwest generally, the reports of the great blizzard, are almost without a parallel in the records of cold weather, heavy snow storms, and destructive winds. It is reported that about one hundred and fifty persons were frozen to death in Dakota, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska and Iowa, and the loss in property will probably reach up to millions.

The awful records of the disastrous storm contain many recitals of heroic suffering and splendid heroism, and impressions other than those of horror, come with their perusal-love and honor for the brave men and women who endured and died that others might live. Especially pathetic are the dozen or more cases where heroic little girl school teachers, some of them not more than sixteen years of age, who being caught by the fierce storm in their little log school houses, gave their own wraps and warmer clothing to their younger charges, and faced and found death, while trying to reach places of warmth and safety.

We will stay in northern Michigan yet awhile.

Christ Church Sunday School reports a prosperous condition. A steady and substantial growth both in numbers and interest since its reorganization last Easter. The most satisfactory and cheering result is the marked and very decided change in the manner and deportment in many of the children, showing a growth in grace. On Sunday last at the session of the Sunday School, eighteen persons came, or were brought to Christ in the sacrament of baptism, Rev. J. W. Bancroft, general Missionary, officiating. Several others "ready and desirous," providentially detained. On Christmas day a League of Honor was instituted and its members all have perfect record, attendance, lessons and conduct from Easter to Christmas. Carl Gains Clifford, Florence Ometa Herson, Ethel Blanche Herson, Beatrine Isabel Cross and Ida Olney, were enrolled as members of the League all having such record. All others who are alike worthy till then, will have their names placed on the roll of honor at Easter. Hour of session, 3 p. m. every Sunday. Place, Green's hall.

SONG OF THE WASH-WOMAN.

BY IRVING A. MILLER.

It's wash, wash, wash the livelong day,
And iron, iron, iron all night,
I earn my living honestly,
And ...

Ten years ago, who would have thought these hands would ...
The heavy load they daily bear in a world of ...
Who would have thought this brow would ever be lined with care? Oh, no!
Thank God our lives don't always last and our thoughts die when we die.

Nobody knows or even thinks of the wars I have to fight;
It's wash, wash, wash, and iron, iron, iron from morning until night.
No matter whether sick or well, I must labor hard each day,
For all depends on what I earn, as my living is my pay.

I have a little boy named Joe, he is all I have on earth;
It's just eight years ago to-day since his mother gave him birth.
He was his papa's little pet and his mamma's pride and joy.
God knows I dearly love my babe, oh my darling Joe, my boy.

Had Charlie lived and kept his health, what a different world 'twould be?
Perhaps we would be dwelling now in a home of luxury;
But as it is I'm all alone with a child to clothe and feed.
God sparing me to live for him, he shall never go in need.

There is one thing I'm bound shall be, 'tis a cause on which I'm bent:
I'm bound to educate my child if it takes the last red cent.
I love him! oh, I love my child with a love as pure as snow!
I'll fight for him, I'll die for him, oh, my darling boy, my Joe.

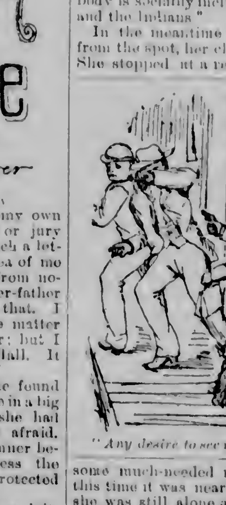
CHAPTER VIII—CONTINUED.



"Any Junker to see me, try my skill?"

... refused to stop at the drawn rein of their frightened colored driver.

"You heedless rascal!" exclaimed her rescuer, addressing the darky. "What do you mean by driving in such a reckless manner?" Then he turned to Nora, who stood by his side, pale but not at all frightened, although she realized from what she had just been saved.

"I beg your pardon, miss, but—Good heavens! Miss Fairleigh."

Nora had recognized him instantly, and conscious of her dusty appearance, her wearied face, flushed slightly but bowed and said quietly:

"Mr. Foster Gray, I believe?"

"Yes; and what wonderful chance brought you here? I thought you at North Platte."

"So I was," smiled Nora, "a week ago, and I expect to return there in another week—or rather to pass through there and go on to Cheyenne."

"But you are weary and I am keeping you standing so long. This is my uncle's home and—would you—could you——"

But Nora shakes her head decidedly.

"I must be going, thank you for keeping me from under those horses' feet. I was merely viewing this lovely place."

"Yes, it is pretty; but, Miss Fairleigh, where are you stopping? If I might call—or do you any favor."

"I came to Virginia to visit friends of papa's. No, thank you, but I couldn't ask you to call." And in spite of herself, Nora blushed furiously, determined he should not know how friendless she was.

He watched her graceful figure as she walked down the street, and wondered what her presence meant in Richmond.

"Of all the strange happenings! I wonder if she knew this was once her father's house? She little imagined ...

... you ran yourselves? What dunces you men are!"

The Captain was in furious anger, and Jim thought best to conciliate him.

"The darky ain't been gone more'n two days. I sent Joe and Rash after him as soon's ever we found he'd cut and run, and they'll track him and report shortly, never fear about that."

"Yes, but it only complicates matters, and besides if he should be dead, although he could tell no tales, I desired to gain a little more information from him."

Jim laughed gayly.

"You'll have to go to the land where good darkies go when they die, if you want to question old Skete."

"I apprehend trouble even here from some of the Indians that are our bitterest enemies. Have you the magazine in excellent order?"

"Yes, Captain, we'll blow 'em higher than the clouds—if they'll only give us a chance."

"Very well, see that watches are kept constantly on guard; we have much valuable booty that must not fall into the hands of the red-skins. Hallo, there come Joe and Rash. Now what news?" anxiously inquired Iron Dan.

"Good and bad, both, Captain. Old Skete was taken off captive by a lot of redskins; we found his bandana kerchief on the spot where they had cooked their dinner, and that's the last of him; but over on our left we found signs of Indians, and shouldn't wonder but they'd discover our hiding-place—inaccessible though it seems."

"Yes, Captain," put in another, "an' that ain't all. Slippery Sam's been gone for a long time, and I'm expectin' him to overtake us some o' these times with a party o' vigilants."

"Nonsense! Vigilants are not plenty hereabouts, redskins are much thicker. But what do you suppose has become ...

"Hello!" he thought, "what's that?"

SHERMAN ON THE TARIFF.

Cleveland's Tariff-Tinkering Argument Ably Answered by the Ohio Senator.

The Principle of Protection Demands Equality of Benefits and of Burdens.

Cheap Labor in This Country Means the Degradation of American Politics.

An Analysis of the Causes that Have Resulted in an Enormous Treasury Surplus.

Senator Sherman made his expected speech on the President's message, in the Senate of the United States, on the 4th inst.

The President of the United States, he said, departing from the practice of his illustrious predecessors, dropped from his recent annual message all reference to the foreign relations of the country and to the interesting questions in national affairs, even omitting the usual recognition of the Supreme Ruler of the universe, and postponing all things celestial and terrestrial ... the surplus revenue be got rid of. This extraordinary message he (Mr. Sherman) felt called upon to consider, to inquire whether the dangers spoken of in it were exaggerated or not, and examine the remedies proposed. The existence of a surplus revenue has been a constant occurrence before and since the close of the war. Instead of its being a danger, it was an indication of the continuous increase of the domestic productions of the country and its foreign and domestic commerce, and of the steady improvement of its financial condition. When, in 18.., President Jefferson had the good ...

... do his part of applying the income to current appropriations and to the judicious purchase of the public debt, the delays of the Democratic party might be repaired, and taxation reduced without crippling industry.

He did not attribute either to the President or to the Secretary of the Treasury an intent to produce the dangers and difficulties by which the country was threatened, nor did he call in question their integrity or fidelity, but when they tried to alarm the country so as to induce Congress to break down great industrial interests he pointed them to the neglect of a public duty intrusted to their discretion as the fountain of their woes. An artificial scare could not be made to cover the faults and defects of the administration.

The internal system of taxation upon spirits, tobacco and beer the President had dismissed with a single sentence saying that none of those articles were necessaries; that there seemed to be no just complaint of such taxation by consumers, and that there seemed to be nothing so well able to bear the burden without hardship to any portion of the people. It might be that there was no complaint of consumers; but could that be said of the producers of these articles? Tobacco manufacturers, distillers and brewers might not complain because the necessary requirements of the laws gave them a close monopoly, but the farmers, who had to sell to licensed dealers alone, did complain. The tax on whisky might and to a certain extent did restrain the use of whisky as a beverage, and in that way the tax did good, but the taxes on beer and tobacco did not. Internal taxes were a necessity during the war; but now, if continued, they should be reduced, and the tax on tobacco especially should be remitted.

Though not a necessity, like bread and meat, the use of tobacco was so general that its tax was a burden to the farmer and to the consumer. The special taxes on rectifiers, special dealers, stills, etc., yielding annually $..., ought to be repealed and their imposition left to the States, and the tax on spirits and beer might be so modified that the States could make taxes on the consumption of these articles a source of revenue.

If the object sought was only to avoid the accumulation of surplus, the easy, natural and logical course was to repeal or largely to reduce internal revenue. But the President proposed to continue these taxes without diminution, so that he might strike a more effective blow at the taxes now resting upon foreign productions. It was the protective industrial policy built up by the Republican party that they would break down.

The President's message, fairly construed, was a severe indictment of all engaged in manufactures, a sweeping accusation against the policy of protection as supported by the great mass of his countrymen and recommended by his most illustrious predecessors. It showed that he favored a public policy which would leave American manufacturers and workmen to the hard, sharp and grinding competition of ...

CLEVELAND'S POLICY.

Ex-Gov. Long, of Massachusetts, on the Treasury Surplus.

A Remarkably Clear and Effective Statement of the Problem.

Congressman John D. Long, of Massachusetts, has recently written a letter to the Boston Advertiser in response to an inquiry for his views of the surplus, and how it should be reduced. It is a wonderfully clear and effective statement of the problem, and exposes the insincerity or the peril of Mr. Cleveland's policy as outlined in his message most admirably. The President pretends to be very solicitous that the surplus of over $100,000,000 should be reduced, but the items which he suggests should be placed on the free list in order to do it amount to but a drop in the bucket. If, therefore, he be really sincere, he must attack the surplus by either repealing the internal revenue taxes, and he says he would not do that, or he must make a general assault upon the whole line of protected industries, and Governor Long shows how that would have to be done, as follows:

"The problem is this. With over $300,000,000 revenue, of which over $200,000,000 is from customs, and over $100,000,000 from internal taxes on tobacco and spirits, and with about $100,000,000 of this gross revenue not needed, and therefore to be cut off, from what items shall it be cut? The President says by no means from the internal taxes of $100,000,000 on tobacco and spirits. Passing, then, to the $200,000,000 customs revenue, more than $50,000,000 of that sum is the tariff on imported sugar, so important an article that the refusal of the President to even allude to it as a source of reduction must be taken as a recommendation by him to leave that also as it is. Of the remaining $150,000,000 ...

THE FUNNY YAMENI RUNNERS.

Adventures of the Around-the-World Bicyclist in the Celestial Empire.

Taken all in all my trip through China was about the toughest bit of experience on the whole journey around the world on a bicycle, writes Thomas Stevens, the cyclist. Nothing is more certain than that I should have perished at the hands of some howling city mob in the interior except for the good services of the yameni runners, under whose protection I traveled during the last two weeks I was in the country.

The yameni runners of China correspond to the zaptiehs of Turkey and the sowars of Persia, Afghanistan, and other Central Asian countries. Attached to the government of every city or district are a certain number of those yameni runners. Their duty is to carry dispatches, convey prisoners, protect property, act as escort, and otherwise obey orders in the service of the mandarins.

The yameni runners wear the ordinary Chinese garments, with the exception of the coat, which is embellished with sundry distinguishing appendages. The most prominent of these, and by which the yameni runners may readily be distinguished from other people as far as he can be seen, are two big white "bull's-eyes," one on his back and the other in front. These round white patches are about eighteen inches in diameter and are marked with big red characters which indicate the district the wearer belongs to.

The real object of these large disks of white is to form a fitting groundwork for the conspicuous display of the characters. The European residences of the treaty ports, however, facetiously call them "bull's-eyes," and ...

Sleetover.

A Russian chemist is reported to have invented a gunpowder which, if it is as successful in actual warfare as it has been in the preliminary experiments, promises to revolutionize the science of international carnage by doing away with heavy artillery altogether. Ordinary gunpowder and guncotton explode by expanding with great force, either simultaneously in all directions or downward, and as a result the guns from which the projectiles are to be forced must be made of metal thick enough and strong enough to resist the power of the expansion. Hence, heavy cannon requiring bulky carriages and great power to move them are absolute requisites to an army using heavy ammunition in its operations, and the artillery has become in many cases a most important branch of the army in the field. Heavy artillery, however, can only be moved slowly and with great difficulty, and in case of mountainous regions it is almost impossible to make it effective for an invading force on account of the natural impediments to its progress. The Russian inventor, if his discovery proves to be what it is claimed, has solved the problem of making heavy shells and balls available without the use of weighty and bulky guns.

The new explosive, says the New York Times, is called "sleetover," and its composition for the present is a secret known only to the discoverer and the war office at St. Petersburg ...

THE KISS OF DEATH.

Strange Superstition of Mexicans—The Specter of the Grave.

[San Francisco Chronicle.]

One morning after breakfast the writer expressed a wish to stroll into the ancient graveyard attached to the old adobe church of the quaint little Mexican town of San Juan. The old padre, with the kindness and courtesy characteristic of the simple missionary fathers, at once acceded and accompanied the writer, relating as we walked among the graves the brief history of some who lay quietly beneath. "Here," he observed, with a quiet smile, as he pointed to a grave in the middle of the cemetery, "here is a grave which the simple old Mexican families around here look upon with unusual interest, if not with actual awe."

"A murder?"

"No, no! Something much stranger! I have tried to combat the idea, and while I would be addressing the people they would say 'Si, si, padre.' They would assent to all I said, but the belief remained, and does remain indelible.

"A spirit," he began, "is said to have appeared to every one buried in that grave, and to warn the family whenever any of them is about to pass away.

"Its appearance, which is generally made in the following manner, is believed to be uniformly fatal, being an omen of death to those who are so unhappy as to meet with it.

"When a funeral takes place the spirit is said to watch the person who remains last in the graveyard, over whom it possesses a fascinating influence.

"If the person be a young man the spirit takes the shape of a fascinating female, inspires him with a charmed ...

STRUCK BLIND.

The Deadly Poison that Blighted the Optic Nerves.

[Rochester Union and Advertiser.]

Our reporter was very much struck with a conversation between two well-known citizens, a short time ago.

"I notice you wear very strong eye-glasses."

"Yes, yes; I am a perfect slave to my goggles. It is hard for me to understand why one's eyesight fails when all other faculties appear to be in good condition. Even the young appear to lose their eyesight."

"I question very much the theory and the old notion that poor light, fine print, etc. is responsible for it."

"... you may. If you consult an oculist for eye treatment, you will find he is almost sure to analyze the fluids passed before he will commence treatment, one once told me that part of the failing eyesight was attributable to disease of the kidneys, because of their inability to expel the uric acid from the system."

"How is that?"

"I do not know. He claimed that failing eyesight was one of the most prominent symptoms of advanced kidney and Bright's disease."

Becoming more interested our reporter thought he would carry on investigations still further, and called upon an institution where several prominent physicians are employed, and asked the question:

"Why is it that uric acid or kidney poison affects the eyes?"

One of them answered, "It does not affect the eyes any more than any other organ. It is one of the symptoms of kidney disease. The system becomes saturated with uric acid, and, as a result, the weakest organ is the first to suffer. It may be the lungs, heart, brain, or any other organ; it generally affects many of the other organs, and the person so affected may call it general debility, or premature old age, when in reality it is but the effect of uric acid, continually poisoning the system, gradually consuming the patient. It is for this reason our remedy cures so many persons of what are ordinarily called diseases, which in fact are only symptoms. We cure the cause, and the cause cures the effect."

"Then you cure blindness, do you?"

"I will say yes, if you wish to put it as broad as that, and yet we are not entitled to the credit. When we restore the kidneys to health, they in turn restore the failing eyesight ...

Beef tea should be prepared as follows: Cut the beefsteak into fine pieces. Put the chopped meat, without any water, into a small vessel, which is set into a kettle of warm water. Heat gradually, keeping the water in the kettle above blood heat, but do not allow it to boil. Remove the small vessel containing the meat and the juice which has exuded from it, strain its contents, season and serve. As thus prepared beef tea is somewhat more nutritious than Liebig's extract; still its chief value is to those who need a stimulant and to those for whom a very small amount of food is sufficient.

Bone consists of a gelatine forming organic substance and of mineral salts. Besides, the marrow contains considerable fat and a little albumen. About one-third of the bone is organic matter, a large part of which is soluble in boiling water. For this reason bone is valuable in making soups. The long bones are not acted upon by water readily unless they first be cut or ground into small pieces. The bones of the spine and the ribs make a very nutritious soup, which yields as much as twenty-four per cent. of the weight of the bone in solid matter. Bones should be boiled for several hours in order to get all the food stuffs out of them. When we remember that these soups are also used for the purpose of serving vegetables we may appreciate the real value of bone as a source of food.—American Healthy Homes and Food.

Is This What Ails You?

Do you have dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; eyes weak, watery, and inflamed; ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers; voice changed and nasal twang; breath offensive; smell and taste impaired; is there a sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility? If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from Nasal Catarrh. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, or less understood, or more unsuccessfully treated by physicians. The manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy offer, in good faith, a reward of $500 for a case of this disease which they cannot cure. The Remedy is sold by druggists, at only 50 cents.

He was one of the speakers, and alluding to the civil war, suggested as a parallel case the parable of the Prodigal Son and the joyful reception at his home when the naughty boy returned. He was succeeded by a negro, a Republican, who, after some general remarks, paid his respects to Mr. Lamar's parallel. "Forgiben!" said he. "Dey forgiben—dem brigadiers! Why, dey'se come walkin' into de house an' bang de do' an' go up to de ol' man an' say: 'Whar dat veal?'"

Now that it has been proven that a mammoth steel gun can be made at practically one casting, the government ought to invest in a few good-sized pieces of ordnance. The experiment at Pittsburg recently showed that one of these cannons could be made at a cost of $2,300, or thereabouts, whereas, under the old process, the cost was nearly $10,000. If these figures be correct, and there is but little doubt that they are, the government can, at a comparatively small cost, provide our navy with decent equipment of ordnance. Popguns are all well enough as playthings for children, but they are of little value in coast-defense or naval warfare.

Several distressing railroad accidents have already occurred in 1888. If the same proportion of disasters should be kept up during the year, it will be more terribly fatal to human life even than last year, and the last furnished a record dark enough, much more so than any since 1880. The total number of persons killed was 1,822, as compared with 855 in 1886, 947 in 1885, 621 in 1884, 775 in 1883, 820 in 1882, and 1,040 in 1881. The total number of those seriously injured shows a proportionate increase and foots up 1,998, as compared with 860 in 1886, 936 in 1885, 1,050 in 1884, 1,116 in 1883, 1,115 in 1882, and 527 in 1881.

Owing to the monopoly of the supply of natural gas by capitalists and corporations, the cities which flattered themselves on the advantages it was going to give them over their rivals, are much disappointed at the result. The price has been advanced until it is almost as costly as other fuel—especially crude petroleum—and its chief economy and attractiveness are cleanliness, the absence of ashes, the saving in the storage and transportation of coal, and in the wages of firemen. Unless it is found in such quantities as to prevent a monopoly, it is not the benefit that was at first supposed.

Lamar has been confirmed by the Senate. The Inter-Ocean says: The people will accept the confirmation of Mr. Lamar as a hazardous experiment at the best. Mr. Lamar may as a justice of the Supreme Court agreeably disappoint those who have viewed his possible promotion to the bench with misgivings and alarm, but no attacks upon those who opposed his appointment and no criticism of the senators who voted against his confirmation will quiet the uneasiness in the hearts of the people. The people of strong faith in the Union and the Constitution will not fail to notice that the Senators who were leaders in the fight for the Constitution and the Union all voted against Mr. Lamar.

The serious difficulties regarding the tariff need [illegible] from time to time, but not with a hostile and destructive motive. The amicable agreement just brought about at Washington between the wool growers and woolen manufacturers teaches this point. The free trade papers have been showing that the philosophy of protection did not cover carpet wools, which could not be fostered in this country because there are none to foster. On the other hand, the duty has been a serious embarrassment to the carpet interest. When the two sides of this question got together in Washington and looked the points over an agreement was soon reached that conserved the interests of both.

Rear Admiral Jouett advises the shipping convention that Detroit and other lake cities are in a defenseless condition, and that England would be able to send gunboats to Detroit and other exposed ports, while the United States is shut off from defending those cities. The Admiral says that no other nation is surrounded by such dangers as is the United States. If the fisheries commission fail to agree, the gravest consequences may result. As the Welland canal leads into our entire chain of lakes, England can throw 50 gunboats on our lakes and into the ports of these great lake cities at will. We have a treaty, made in 1812, by which neither nation can have on the lakes more than one 100 ton vessel, carrying one 18-pound gun.

The sub-committee on accounts of the House of Representatives has approved the bill for the funeral expenses of Representative Seth C. Moffatt. The items were: Pennsylvania Railroad, $624; Washington undertaker, $425; Traverse City undertaker, $15; Livery bill at Traverse City, $20; tickets for pall bearers, meals, and telegrams, $292; total, $1,376. It will be noticed that this bill is very much less than any of the kind previously paid. There are no charges for any luxaries or liquors such as have been presented for Congressional funerals in the past. Everything was conducted in a modest, decent manner, and it is believed that this funeral will establish a precedent from which future officials of the House will not care to depart when it becomes necessary to accompany the remains of a deceased member to his home.

Not only does the participation of Democratic office-holders in political conventions go unrebuked, but the President himself does not scruple to use his official influence to aid the Democratic candidate for a local office in New York city. With this example before them, what can be expected of his subordinates? Senator Hale's prediction that every office-holder and government contractor will be levied upon to help elect the Democratic national ticket in the coming election is fully warranted. The civil service law has become a nullity and civil service reform a sham and pretense. This the record proves, and few Democrats will take the trouble to deny it. Only a few of the Mugwump variety try to keep up the farce, but the President's refusal to play a part any longer makes their efforts exceedingly lame.—Philadelphia Press.

The Detroit Tribune expresses the following very sensible opinion concerning the local option law: The Counties which have voted on local option have given overwhelming majorities for county prohibition. There can be no mistaking the judgment of the people in those counties. It is emphatically against the saloon and its influence in politics and society. The voters in these counties have declared that the saloon must go and the officers whose duty it is to enforce the law must be faithful to their obligations or step down and out. What will the saloons do? Do they think they can safely defy this overwhelming public sentiment and continue their traffic in violation of the law which public sentiment has so strongly ratified at the poles? They are foolish if they do. Prudence tells them to quietly submit to the will of the people and prepare at once to close up their business. Resistance will only make them trouble and expense. Sufficient time is given them under the law to permit them to retire from the business of liquor selling and to engage in some honorable and worthy calling. And after they have done this, we are sure that many of them will rejoice over the change, even though it came by compulsion. As it is now with the old slave-keeper so will it be with the saloon-keeper. The former will not go back to slavery for he now sees it it was a curse. The latter will not go back to the saloon business for he too will, when he gets out of it, admit it is a curse.

Remains of a Volcano.

A Middletown, Conn., letter says: The recent discovery of the remains of a volcano near Mount Lamentation, the highest peak in the chain of Meriden hills, [illegible] the keenest interest in scientific circles. It has furnished a new key to the geological history of the Connecticut valley. The discovery was made by Prof. W. N. Davis, of Harvard university. He has been engaged in making an exhaustive study of the trap-rock of this state, and he made his happy discovery of volcanic ruins while searching for an entirely different class of geological phenomena.

Mount Lamentation has been visited by large numbers of people during the past few weeks. The various scientific associations of the state, and several geologists of national repute, have carefully examined the interesting curiosity. No volcanic cone or crater is still visible, but the phenomena of the place clearly indicate that at a distant age violent explosive eruptions of a regular volcanic type were frequent. Geologists have long known that the trap-rock of the Connecticut valley came up in a molten condition and afterward solidified. [illegible] liquidness sometimes solidified in fissures in the earth and sometimes overflowed the surface like lava streams, and was consequently covered up by a stratum of sandstone.

Prof. Davis has discovered what is technically known as an agglomerate. It is a deposit formed when molten lava is thrown high into the air by violent explosions, and comes down in a confused mass, coarse and fine. In the triassic period when these eruptions occurred there must have been regular cones and craters of the usual type, but these have all been effaced. It is very probable that other ash-beds may exist in the range of Meriden hills. The geological history of this region has always afforded a rich field for scientific research, and the recent volcanic discovery has given a greater scientific boom to it.

What the Ghost Said.

Ghosts seem to have played an important part in some of the early trials of this state. In 1801 a man named Joseph Inman had a preliminary trial at Eddington for murder. He and one Oliver Holmes, both residents of Orono, had a quarrel and soon after it was discovered that Holmes was missing. One of the most important witnesses against Inman was his own son William, who swore he saw his father strike Holmes. The Bangor Historical Magazine has a piece of testimony of this William Inman as follows:

"I, William Inman, being at a place called Marsh's Island or [illegible] in the house of Joseph Treat, and John Spencer came in with a pail of [illegible] told me if I would fetch some water I should have some grog to drink with him. I took a pail in my hand and stepped out towards the water and something appeared before me but I went on and looking about it seemed to be a ghost. I dipped some water and turned about to go back. It rose right up before me and seemed to go backward. It spoke to me and said you may now know what you wanted to know. Your father was the very man that killed me, and walked away and this I am willing to take my oath of."

Notwithstanding this convincing piece of testimony signed by William Inman's mark, and the fact that Inman was confined in [illegible] jail to answer to the charge of murder, the case never came to trial—for the reason that one day Holmes appeared at Orono, having seen in a paper an account of Inman's arrest, to "show people that he was not dead."—Lewiston (Me.) Journal.

Victim of His Own Joke.

An amusing incident occurred to a Washington street firm this week, which pleases me, because I like to see practical jokers come to grief. Practical jokers rank in my mind with book agents, who have no professional rights which one is bound to respect. The firm in question deals in foreign rugs, and has its rooms up one flight. The entrance from the street is a wide one, and in it the firm is accustomed to hang specimens of their wares as a bait for passers who may be possible customers. Unfortunately, these displayed rugs proved as attractive to sneak-thieves as to purchasers, and the firm found itself out of pocket by frequent depredations. To remedy this evil a stout cord was attached to each rug, and in turn fastened to a bell rope. The porters were instructed at the sound of the bell to precipitate themselves as swiftly as possible on the thief; and on the very first day that the new arrangement was made a sneaking little Jew was captured in the very act of attempting feloniously to possess himself of one of the rugs. [illegible] demanded by the irate porters, but to save himself from prosecution he was forced to pay for all the rugs that had before been missing, although he protested volubly that he was innocent of their most damnable taking off. Soon another pilferer was also seized, but as he was penniless he was unable to buy himself off, and met the fate of other poverty-stricken malefactors in being sent down to the Island to reflect on the vanity of appearances and the cruelty of the human lot.

By this time the junior partner of the firm, who invented the thief trap, was so proud of the success of his device that he bragged of it incessantly; and one of his friends decided that it would be extremely amusing to play the self-satisfied man of rugs a practical joke. He accordingly sauntered into the vestibule one noon and gave the largest rug a vicious jerk. Instantly a pair of big Irish porters precipitated themselves down the stairs and seized him by the collar, giving him, before he had even time to protest, a most thorough shaking. In vain as soon as he recovered his breath, he protested that he was a friend of one of the firm; but they laughed him to scorn, and dragged him up-stairs in a manner which will leave him with shins black and blue for weeks. The senior partner, into whose presence he was tumbled, knew him not, and was inclined to be as skeptical as the porters, who grinned at his discomfiture, and pounced upon if he so much as looked at the door. The junior partner was at luncheon, and until his return the practical joker was kept in durance vile, guarded by the porters, and viewed with sneering suspicion by the senior partner. When at length the junior member of the firm did return, of course there was an instant explanation, but the victim of his own facetiousness does not, in looking back, regard his adventure as the merry jest it promised to be when he looked forward to it with gleeful anticipations of befooling his friend.—Boston Letter.

Stokes' Bouncer.

A man with somber and heavy face walked up to a very small and natty gentleman in the Hoffman House the other night, and said shortly:

"I want to speak to you."

"Well, I don't want to have anything to say to you," said the little man, looking up at his gigantic companion and scowling petulantly.

"But you'll have to, [illegible] it good, all the same," said the big man, angrily. He scowled at the small opponent and moved toward him menacingly. The little man ran affrightedly around the corner of the bar and the big one followed him. The movement attracted the attention of Billy Edwards, who is retained by the Hoffman House to keep order in the cafe, and he stepped forward. A few sharp words passed between the two men, and then, just as the big man started on a rush for his puny opponent, the ex-light-weight stepped between them. It was interesting to note the change that swept over the crowd in the bar-room. None spoke, and there was no crowding forward, but there was a sudden cessation of talk, and the eyes of almost every man in the room were turned on the ex-champion light-weight of the world. Edwards is good-natured and [illegible] to him lately, but the two eyes of the bouncer were soft and suave. His eyes were very cool and cool, however, and the big man seemed to realize that if he went too far Mr. Edwards would cease talking and begin to act with a force and courage for which he has long been famous. The belligerent stranger slowly swallowed his wrath, gulp by gulp, as he continued to look into the eyes of the bouncer. Mr. Edwards never ceased to smile pleasantly, but there was no mistaking the meaning at the smile. After he had slowly backed the big man out into the corridor of the hotel the accustomed tranquility of the place regained its sway.—New York Sun.

An Omaha Miser.

"That coarsely dressed man with a Jewish cast of countenance is worth half a million," remarked a gentleman to a reporter. "He told me one day that he owned forty tenement rookeries. They are all on land worth a great deal of money, and it keeps the old miser who owns them busy repairing roofs, locks and cellar doors. He lives in one little room of one of the meanest looking houses of the lot, on Fifteenth and Leavenworth, during the day and sleeps in a cold barn of a wooden building belonging to him on Thirteenth street. His workshop has but one window. It is entered by a double door, which is protected by iron bars. In this dingy room the old man mends his clothing, tinkers his locks, keeps his valuable papers, and stores the waste lumber that blows off his huts or comes into his possession in other ways. A small, sheet-iron stove, old and rickety as his buildings, fed from the wood piled up in the room, keeps him warm in winter, and a 25-cent kerosene lamp furnishes his light. A desk, two chairs, and a box covered with an old piece of carpet, complete the furnishing of the place. The sole owner and proprietor of all this elegance has lots in all parts of the city, land in every township in the county, and a fat bank account. He has no family, but lives alone. He never sells anything; never improves any property. He exists solely to make and save money and to buy property. His agent must be consulted about every conveyance, and on his judgment he most relies. Always agreeable, yet suspicious of every man who enters his domicile, he is a veritable miser, who will drop off one of these days and leave all his property here for lawyers to quarrel over. He must be 60 years old and half his life has been spent in Omaha. His faith in the city induced him to buy much and sell nothing."—Omaha World.

Is Beauty Dying Out?

A question much discussed in [illegible] circles, says the Philadelphia Times, [illegible] that beauty is [illegible] among women and young girls is [illegible] years ago, second, that ugly women are more numerous, and, third, that the higher and more exclusive the circle, the more fashionable and elegant the surroundings, the less, as a rule, the physical attractiveness of women. Opinions differ as to the cause or causes, for there are probably many, but in the main it seems to be agreed that the luxurious and luxurily artificial manner of living so much in vogue, and the wear and tear of prevailing fashionable dissipation, is much to blame for the result. That there is a great decadence in physical attractiveness among the young women and girls just entering womanhood becomes evident in looking about, at the most popular thoroughfares, the theaters, and the great public gatherings, such as balls, and how rare is a genuinely pretty girl or beautiful woman. It is not many years since it was a very ordinary occurrence to find a girl or woman on Chestnut street so unmistakably pretty as to [illegible] turned to look at her. The songs, the ballads, the poetry and the fiction were full of references to beauty, whereas now beauty is but rarely sung and even in fiction most of the heroines are commonplace.

But the scarcity of beauty is not confined to fashionable society, a circumstance that goes to show that fashionable dissipation is not the whole root of the trouble after all. It was the common remark a few years ago that the prettiest girls in Philadelphia were to be found behind the counters in the large dry goods shops, and to a large extent it was true. Now, it is almost impossible to find a girl that can be really classed as beautiful in one of these establishments. Where there is a girl in any of the stores that is at all pretty such is the prevailing low average of beauty—she is immediately talked about and the people who patronize the establishment, none more so than the ladies of fashion themselves, say to one another: "Have you seen that pretty girl at what-do-you-call-ems? You must go and look at her." There is nothing scarcer at the present moment than beauty, and with its scarcity comes fiercer and a more general appreciation of it. A new American beauty or a fresh importation of beauty from anywhere sets London, the fashionable metropolis of the world, in a flutter. All through the summer season the leading topic of conversation at Newport and the subject of every correspondent's pen from there were the two acknowledged beauties of the place. At every watering-place and resort the presence or absence of beauties was the point on which everything else turned. The beauties of nature at Mount Desert were never heard of until the beauties of society began going there, and what has made it the greatest resort of the past two seasons has been that there were more beautiful women there than anywhere else.

The Story of a Prescription.

A druggist tells this story at his own expense. Said he: "A man came in with a prescription, and I noticed that the paper did not bear the name of any physician. I called the customer's attention to it, and he replied that he knew all about it, and wrote the prescription. 'Never mind,' said he, 'who wrote it. The doctor signed his name and I cut it off.' 'What did you cut it off for?' I asked eagerly. 'So that I wouldn't have to pay you his commission,' was the innocent response. I then tacked on 15 cents extra for luck, but gave him a glass of soda with a wink in it, and he walked out with the air of a man immensely tickled at the success of his scheme."—Boston Gazette.

Giving the Refusal of his Office.

I have heard of a singular mistake which was lately made by a small real estate owner who is not familiar with the technical language of the market in connection with this matter of giving the refusal of property. He actually signed a paper giving the privilege, supposing all the time he was refusing it, under the idea that the other party to the contract thereby tacitly agreed to pay a higher price than the one mentioned in the instrument. The mistake recalled to me the story of a bright young tradesman at the North end who, several years ago, was very attentive to one belle of that quarter, who was known to have higher aspirations. Being pressed to say whether he had succeeded in his suit, the young man said: "Well, I've got the refusal of her." It turned out that he had, though in a different sense from that which he intended to convey.—Boston Post.

Chasing Meteors.

We caution our readers to put no reliance in stories about meteors which come very near those who were startled by them. We were fooled once, about thirty years ago, by one of these brilliant wanderers in space. It passed right over the Litchfield fair grounds, apparently and struck the earth over on Chestnut Hill. We were so fully convinced that it buried itself in Litchfield soil that we cogitated upon the advisability of going over to unearth the thing.

"Pshaw, Joe," said the good old father when we reported the matter on our arrival home, "it was more likely hundreds of miles away." "It can't be, father," we replied; "H. B. Graves saw it and said he should think it passed over John H. Hubbard's house, or at least not further down than the fair grounds. Why, father, we heard it!"

The next day's New York papers weakened our faith in our ability to calculate on meteoric distance. The same brilliant sphere was reported by telegraph as having been seen by people in Kentucky, and a few days later a westward-bound transatlantic steamer reported having seen it 1,500 miles out at sea.—*Winsted (Conn.) The negroes aver that during his illness, while raging in delirium, he constantly "lowed like a cow," and made other noises suggestive of bovine associations.

A Delegation of Business Men Call on President Corbin, of the Reading Road.

A COMMITTEE of business men from the Schuylkill region, says a Reading dispatch, went to Philadelphia on Wednesday to confer with President Corbin in order to induce him to take action to settle the strike. Such towns as St. Clair, Shenandoah, Pottsville, Mahanoy City and other places were represented. President Corbin received the delegation cordially and the situation was discussed. The delegation report that President Corbin refused to recede from his position, that the miners' grievances would only be considered singly and alone, and that as far as the freight handlers and trainmen are concerned the company will maintain that it can employ whomsoever it pleases.

Merrimac River between Bradford and Haverhill, and nine persons were killed and over fifty hurt more or less seriously. The train consisted of eight cars. The train does not stop at Bradford, and was going at great speed. The Georgetown branch train was standing on the track near the water tank house at the Bradford end of the bridge, waiting for the express to pass over to Haverhill. As the express rounded the curve two of its cars left the rails and went crashing into the water-tank house, demolishing it. In this house a number of section hands were eating dinner. Two of them were killed. The car that crashed into the tank house knocked the foundation out, letting the heavy tank down upon the car, crushing through the top of it and doing fearful work within. The next car behind telescoped the one ahead of it, adding to the havoc. The killed and wounded were mostly in those two cars. The cars behind these two ran down alongside the Georgetown train, barely escaping a collision with the engine of that train.

AT a conference in Jersey City between representatives of the various trades involved in the Reading strike, says a New York telegram, it was decided that the men should be ordered out of the Wyoming mine. This action, it was said, would practically stop work in the anthracite coal region. Closing the Wyoming mines, he added, would result in thousands of men being thrown out of work for want of fuel to run factories and mills.

NATIONAL LAW-MAKERS.

What Is Being Done by the National Legislature.

THE Blair educational bill came up in the Senate on the 5th inst., and Mr. Reagan, of Texas, spoke in opposition to the measure. He said he opposed the methods of the bill, but not its purposes. Congress lacked power to pass such a law, which would establish the despotism of a popular majority, overthrow the Constitution, and endanger the liberties of the people. He argued in detail that the Southern States were not in need of Federal aid for the support of their common schools, and showed that in the State of Texas the school fund for this year was $3,100,000. Mr. Plumb offered an amendment providing that the money shall be distributed among the several States and Territories in proportion to their population according to the census of 1880. Mr. Mitchell called up his resolution for the appointment of a commission to select a site for another naval station on the Pacific coast, and advocated its passage. The Indian Affairs Committee reported bills to provide for the compulsory education of Indian children, and in relation to marriage between white men and Indian women. Petitions were presented favoring a national prohibition amendment, opposing the admission of Utah while its total power is in the hands of the Mormons, and in favor of prohibition in the District of Columbia. Among the bills introduced in the Senate were the following: By Mr. Dawes, to establish a postal telegraph system; by Mr. Platt, for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of North Dakota; by Mr. Plumb, to equalize bounties (this is the Logan bill of last Congress); by Mr. Stockbridge, appropriating $100,000 for a public building at Lansing, Mich. With the continuance of cold weather, sleighing, tobogganing and ice skating remain the popular methods of winter pastime in the great centers of population throughout the Northwest. At Chicago, St. Paul and Minneapolis the toboggan slides both great and small are daily and nightly filled with brilliantly costumed young revelers who enjoy the rapid rush of the toboggans, the crisp cold of the atmosphere, and the exhilarating effects of the climb up the run-way as they have never enjoyed a winter pastime before. gunboats moving around to see what was the matter. To add to our uneasiness some of the barrels of oil began to explode with a loud roar. As there appeared to be some commotion in the direction of Ship Island, it was decided to burn the other schooner and take the prisoners into Fort Morgan.

Accordingly, the lumber schooner was fired and we put a full force at the oars to assist the sails. Before night we were skirting the coast of Mississippi Sound well toward Mobile Bay. Just at night a gunboat appeared on the horizon making toward us from the bay. Rowing was stopped and sails slackened until it was decided what should be done. A few moments answered to settle the matter. Sails were braced up and we continued on directly toward the gunboat, while the oars were being muffled ready to use as soon as we encountered danger. The wind blew pretty fresh from the south, as it had been doing all day, and tended to drive us on shore.

As we approached where we expected to see the gunboat, we saw her light just off the entrance to the Sound, either waiting for us or had not yet discovered us. We concluded to run as close to shore as possible, and when we were opposite the gunboat put all hands at the oars and run for life. "The Women Who Fight the Battles of Life Alone."

Woman Is an Independent Creation and Is Able to Be Her Own Supervisor and Achieve Her Own Destiny—The Story of the Dove and the Vulture.

BROOKLYN, Jan. 8.—The Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., preached at the Tabernacle this morning the first of a series of sermons to the women of America, with practical hints to men. The subject of this discourse was "The Women Who Fight the Battles of Life Alone," and the text was from Proverbs xiv, 1: "Every wise woman buildeth her house." Dr. Talmage said:

Woman a mere adjunct to man, an appendix to the masculine volume, an appendage, a sort of afterthought, something thrown in to make things even—that is the heresy entertained and implied by some men. This is evident to them: Woman's insignificance as compared to man is evident to them, because Adam was first created and then Eve. They don't read the whole story or they would find that the porpoise and the bear and the hawk were created before Adam, so that this argument drawn from priority of creation might prove that the sheep and the dog were greater than man. No! Woman was an independent creation, and was intended, if she chose, to live alone, to walk alone, act alone, think alone, and [illegible] that counter, while the males have from the day they left the public school been learning the business.

How is this evil to be cured? Start clear back in the homestead and teach your daughters that life is an earnest thing, and that there is a possibility, if not a strong probability, that they will have to fight the battle of life alone. Let every father and mother say to their daughters: "Now, what would you do for a livelihood if what I now own were swept away by financial disaster, or old age or death should end my career?"

"Well, I could paint on pottery and do such decorative work." Yes, that is beautiful, and if you have genius for it go on in that direction. But there are enough busy at that now to make a line of hardware from here to the East River and across the bridge.

"Well, I could make recitations in public and earn my living as a dramatist. I could render 'King Lear' or 'Macbeth' till your hair would rise on end, or give you 'Sheridan's Ride' or Dickens' 'Pickwick.'" Yes, that is a beautiful art; but ever and anon, as now, there is an epidemic of dramatization that makes hundreds of households nervous with the cries and shrieks and groans of young tragedians dying in the fifth act, and the trouble is that while your friends would like to hear you, and really think that you could surpass Ristori and Charlotte Cushman and Fanny Kemble of the past, to say nothing of the present, you could not, in the way of living, in ten years earn ten cents.

My advice to all girls and all unmarried women, whether in affluent homes or in homes where most stringent economies are grinding, is to learn to do some kind [illegible] manner and quicker perception and more delicate touch and more educated adroitness she will in certain callings be to her employer worth 10 per cent. more, or 20 per cent. more, than the other sex. She will not get it by asking for it, but by earning it, and it shall be hers by lawful conquest.

Now, men of America, be fair and give the women a chance! Are you afraid that they will do some of your work and hence harm your prosperities? Remember that there are scores of thousands of men doing women's work. Do not be afraid! God knows the end from the beginning and He knows how many people this world can feed and shelter, and when it gets too full He will end the world and, if need be, start another. God will halt the inventive faculty, which, by producing a machine that will do the work of ten or twenty or a hundred men and women, will leave that number of people without work. I hope that there will not be invented another sewing machine, or reaping machine, or corn thresher, or any other new machine for the next 500 years. We want no more wooden hands, and iron hands, and steel hands, and electric hands substituted for men and women who would otherwise do the work and get the pay and earn the livelihood.

But God will arrange all, and all we have to do is to do our best and trust Him for the rest. Let me cheer all women fighting the battle of life alone, with the fact that thousands of women have in that way won the day. INTRODUCTORY.

In our last lesson there was a voice of alarm from Galilee's waters, and a ready answer of succor. Another solicitous voice rings out in this lesson, making itself heard from the far coasts of a larger sea, and there is an answering voice of compassion, as strong and effectual, though it be a little longer withheld. That meant health and comfort for the disciples; this means help and comfort for all the world. It is perhaps a fortnight after the feeding of the five thousand. Christ is walking with His disciples, a [illegible]

DR. TALMAGE'S SERMON.

Second of the "Series to Women" at the Tabernacle.

"Marriage for Worldly Success Without Regard to Moral Character" the Subject—Men Who Pretend to Despise Religion Are Rank Hypocrites.

BROOKLYN, Jan. 15.—In the Brooklyn Tabernacle this morning the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., preached the second of the series of sermons to the women of America, with important hints to men. The subject of the sermon was, "Marriage for worldly success without regard to moral character," and the text was from I. Samuel xxv, 2: "And there was a man in Maon, whose possessions were in Carmel, and the man was very great, and he had three thousand sheep and a thousand goats." Dr. Talmage said:

My text introduces us to a drunken bloat of large property. Before the day of safety deposits and government bonds and national banks people had their investments in flocks and herds, and this man, Nabal, of the text, had much of his possessions in live stock. He came also of a distinguished family and had glorious Caleb for an ancestor. But this descendant was a sneak, a churl, a sot, and a fool. One instance to illustrate. It was a wool raising country, and at the time of shearing a great feast was prepared for the shearers; and David and his warriors, who had in other days saved from destruction the threshing floors of Nabal, sent to him asking, in this time of plenty, for some bread for their starving men. And Nabal cried out "Who is David?" As though an Englishman had said, "Who is Wellington?" or a German should say, "Who is Von Moltke?" or an American should say, "Who is Washington?" Nothing did Nabal give to the starving men, and that night the scoundrel lay dead drunk at home, and the Bible gives us a full-length picture of him sprawling and maudlin and helpless.

Now that was the man whom Abigail, the lovely and gracious and good woman married—a tuberose planted beside a thistle, a ...

... somehow get me up and take me along with them."

Man may pretend to despise religion, but they are rank hypocrites. The sea captain was right when he came up to the village on the sea coast and insisted on paying $10 to the church, although he did not attend himself. When asked his reason, he said that he had been in the habit of carrying cargoes of oysters and clams from that place, and he found since that church was built the people were more honest than they used to be, for before the church was built he often found the load, when he came to count it, a thousand clams short. Yes, godliness is profitable for both worlds. Most of the great, honest, permanent worldly successes are by those who reverence God and the Bible. But what I do say is, that if a man have nothing but social position and financial resources, a woman who puts her happiness by marriage in his hand re-enacts the folly of Abigail when she accepted disagreeable Nabal, "whose possessions were in Carmel, and the man was very great, and he had three thousand sheep and a thousand goats."

The marriage day comes and goes. The wedding ring was costly enough and the orange blossoms fragrant enough and the benediction solemn enough and the wedding march stirring enough. And the audience shed tears of sympathetic gladness, supposing that the craft containing the two has sailed off on a placid lake, although God knows that they are launched on a Dead sea, its waters brackish with tears and ghastly with ghastly faces of despair floating to the surface and then going down. There they are, the newly-married pair in their new home. He turns out to be a tyrant. Her will is nothing, his will everything. Lavish of money for his own pleasure, he begrudges her the pennies he pinches out into her trembling palm. Instead of the kind words she left behind in her former home, now there are complaints and fault-findings and curses. He is the master and she the slave. The worst villain on earth is the man who, having captured a woman from her father's house and after the oath of the marriage altar has been pronounced, says, by his manner if not in words: "I have you now in my power. ...

TARIFF LEGISLATION.

Senator Allison Feels There Will Be Some Reductions, but No Sweeping Tariff Changes.

Cleveland's Free Trade Message Will Hurt in the Eastern States.

[Dubuque special to Chicago Inter Ocean.]

Senator Allison having been called home to attend to some important private business, the Inter Ocean correspondent visited him at his residence for the purpose of interviewing him on matters of public interest. The Senator displayed his customary disinclination to submit to the newspaper inquisitor. On the Presidential question and some other topics he refused to say anything, while on other questions he talked quite freely. As to tariff legislation he said, without hesitation, that legislation was needed, and would undoubtedly be enacted during the present session. He said the great surplus now on hand and its rapid accumulation demanded that Congress should do something in the direction of reducing the revenue, and that such action would have been secured during the last session had the Democratic majority in the House been willing to deal with it without sacrificing our industrial interests. This year, he said, the necessity for some action was very great, and Congress would be compelled to act. He did not wish to outline any definite plan, but said the parties were so divided that, in order to reach any result, mutual concessions must be ...

... out such a plank in the platform on which he stood in 1884 Mr. Cleveland would never have been elected. It strengthened him in every Northern State and must have added more to his vote in New York than the beggarly 1,047 plurality which he received over Mr. Blaine. It gave the Democratic speakers and newspapers a chance to claim with some show of sincerity that their party is the friend of the Union soldier. But how will it be next fall? Not only has the pledge been ignored by the whole party, from Cleveland down, but according to Sam Randall, a Democratic leader, the President believes that the internal revenue taxes on whisky and tobacco are oppressive and should be repealed, in whole or in part! On every side we hear of Democratic intentions to repeal the tax on tobacco, which yields 37 millions of revenue, or one-third of the fund pledged by the Democratic platform to be set apart for the payment of soldiers' pensions. They are boldly proposing this repudiation of the promise to the Union soldiers to please the war-tariff wing of their party.

If the Republicans in Congress do their duty they will not fail to force this matter upon the attention of the country and compel the Democracy to face their own music and stand the consequences of their treachery to the soldiers. The American people were educated by six successive Republican administrations to expect campaign pledges to be redeemed, especially those made to "worthy soldiers disabled in the line of duty in the wars of the Republic."—Chicago Tribune.

INTRODUCTORY.

In the far northern part of Palestine is a little village called Banias. It is the relic of once proud Cæsarea Philippi. Even history would have well-nigh forgotten the place but for the fact that once, eighteen hundred years ago, a Master and his group of peripatetic students made a sortie to its borders, and there, in one of its shady resting places, held a quiet but significant conversation. It is not the only Roman city which is beholden to the sacred narrative for its lasting remembrance, the other city of this name on the coast being ...

REMINISCENCES OF PUBLIC MEN.

BY BEN: PERLEY POORE.

Times change and dinners change with them, as was seen by comparing the accounts of President Cleveland's last State dinner with one given by President Washington. I have copied it from the manuscript diary kept by William Maclay, a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania in the First Federal Congress. He was the original "objector," and he made himself very disagreeable to President Washington and his supporters. One day after Washington had met the Senate, he says: "I was called out by the doorkeeper to speak to Col. Humphreys. It was to invite me to dinner with the President on Thursday next at 4 o'clock. I really was surprised at the invitation. It will be my duty to go; however, I will make no inferences whatever. I am convinced all the dinners he can now give, or ever could, will make no difference in my conduct." Then we have his account of the dinner:

"The President and Mrs. Washington sat opposite each other in the middle of the table; the two secretaries, one at each end. It was a great dinner, and the best of the kind ever I was at. First was soup; fish, roasted and boiled; meats, gammon, fowl, etc. The middle of the table was garnished in the ...

He eats absolutely no meat, nor animal fat, nor any expensive grain like good wheat, but lives on millet or small rice, a little milk, with the butter from milk, and the vegetables he grows. Even of these he eats more sparingly than the poorest Tuscan. Once a quarter, perhaps, he will eat enough, during some festival, but, as a rule, he knows accurately what will sustain him, and would be enraged with the wife who cooks for him, if she prepared more. He is assisted in this economy by a religious rule which is undoubtedly, like the rule against killing oxen, a survival from a military law or custom of the most remote antiquity.—Spectator.

LINCOLN'S TEACHER.

Reminiscences of the Martyred President by Uncle Billy Greene.

Every man whoever dabbled in Illinois State politics knows him or has heard of him. To these and to those who know him in his active business life he is known as "Slicky Bill" Green. Young men address him as "Uncle Billy" Green, and the poetic Ed Lanning, of Petersburg, calls him the "Prophet of Menard."

He is called "Slicky Bill" because no sharper, shrewder business man or politician ever lived in Illinois. He is called "Uncle Billy" because he is an old man. Ed Lanning calls him the "Prophet of Menard" because in him is nearly all the history of the country; because he is a prominent figure in old Salem's history, and because in Abraham Lincoln's early manhood Greene was closer to him than any other man and had more influence with him. He, more than any other individual, made Lincoln's first election to the Presidency possible, for he followed Greene's political advice when he would not listen to other men. He was the friend and confident of Lincoln in his early manhood. Greene was sharp, aggressive and successful and Lincoln had faith in his judgment in all things. Greene, on the other hand, stood wondering in the presence of Lincoln's ...

"ALL NATIONS WITNESSES."

The Wonderful Mistakes of Scientists and Educators.

"Prove all things" seems to be the guiding maxim of the people of this age.

This would be all right, were it not for the "know-alls" in every community, who are sure that every introducer of a new idea is a "crank," and that every new invention is "utterly impracticable."

The astonishing fact is that in this class educated men and scientists are found. In the days of George Stephenson, the perfector of the locomotive engine, the scientists proved conclusively that a railway train could never be driven by steam power successfully without peril; but the rushing express trains all over the world show how mistaken they were. There went up a guffaw of laughter at Professor Morse's proposition to make the lightning of heaven his errand boy, and it was proved conclusively that the thing could never be done; but now all the news of the wide world by Associated Press, put in your hands every morning and night, has made all nations witnesses.

Rev. Dr. Talmage in one of his sermons says: If ten men should come to you when you are sick with appalling sickness, and say they had the same sickness and took a certain medicine, and it cured them, you would probably take it. Now, suppose ten other men should come up and say, "We don't believe there is anything in that medicine." "Well," I say, "have you tried it?" "No, I never tried it; but I don't believe there is anything in it." Of course you discredit their testimony. The skeptic may come and say, "There is no power in your religion." "Have you ever tried it?" "No, no." "Then avaunt!" Let me take the testimony of the millions of souls that have been converted to God, and comforted in trial, and solaced in the last hour. We will take ...

Detroit Tribune: Democratic planks: 1. The solid South and the sentiments that keep it solid, viz.: State rights, race prejudice, and sectional hate. 2. Hostility to the development of American industries and the protection of American labor. 3. The saloon power, fostering it in politics and encouraging it in every way.

Gov. Luce has a good vein of common sense which gives practical value to his views. In a recent interview he uttered the following, to which the people will say amen: "I shall pardon no prisoner from any institution on the ground of sickness. Such a course encourages criminals to get sick. It also encourages prison physicians to get them sick. If sickness overtakes a criminal, he must die in the prison where his own evil deeds have brought him."

Congressman Chipman has presented to Secretary Bayard the grievances of American fisherman along the Great Lakes who claim that Canadian officials are preventing them from fishing in Canadian waters and border streams which which have always been regarded as debatable ground. They present as a test case the recent seizure by Fish Commissioner Marx, of Canada, of seines and fishing apparatus valued at $20,000 owned by S. F. Tolsma, one of the most prominent fishermen on the Lakes, with headquarters at Detroit, and who for several years has made Cheboygan his base for receiving the fish caught. These had been in use at the mouth of the St. Marys River and had slightly encroached on Canadian waters. The entire outfit was confiscated, and Tolsma has thus far received no satisfaction from Canadian authorities. Secretary Bayard at once communicated with the British officials, protesting against the seizure.

As an illustration of how Michigan would be affected by Cleveland's tariff views, Congressman Cutcheon in his recent speech said: "Michigan lives almost entirely with its 2,000,000 people by the production of what President Cleveland calls raw material. It is first in iron, copper, salt, lumber, wool and fish. Take out of Michigan to-day what he terms raw material, and there would not be industry in the State left to employ one-fourth the present population. There is no raw material but nature. Take iron, in which 40,000 men in Michigan are engaged. Iron ore is worth possibly 50 cents a ton. Then labor steps in, preforms its office of opening the mine, digging the ore and rolling it out, transports it over the railway to the ore dock, puts it on ship board, transports it to the smelting furnace, puts it into the furnace, mingles it with coal and flux, which labor has produced, and when it comes out it is worth $22 a ton. The $21.50 is nothing more than labor, and the 40,000 laborers in Michigan are just as well entitled to protection as the men engaged in factories or other industries."

Teams crossed the straits at Cheboygan Sunday to Bois Blanc Island for the first time this winter. The recent cold snap has made crossing safe for the time being.

A $20,000 hotel and several cottages, docks for lake steamers, and other summer resort appliances, will be put up at Point Pines on Bois Blanc island next spring.

The total lumber cut of the four Cadillac firms for the year amounts to 75,645,876 feet, an increase of about twenty-five per cent over the cut of 1886. The total shipments are 72,881,022 feet, against 13,590,181 feet in 1886.

John A. Bailey, United States engineer who built the famous Standard Rock lighthouse in Lake Superior, Spectacle Reef lighthouse in Lake Huron, Minot's Ledge lighthouse near Boston, died in Marquette on Sunday week.

Quite a novel scene was presented on Grand Traverse Bay recently. A tug and an ice boat were out on the bay together. The ice was about two and one-half inches thick and the ice boat had the best of the tug as far as speed was concerned.

In many a place in upper Michigan the snow is almost four feet deep on the level, but this is not half so remarkable as the oldest inhabitant has said nothing about it. He has nothing to say, you know for the snow fall beats his time.

Kalkaska Leader: The Smith Lumber Co. will soon put in an electric light plant, to light their mill, and probably several of the same lights will be put on our streets. Quite a number of our business men will also light their establishments in the same way.

Mancelona Herald: Word comes from interested New Yorkers that the Detroit, Charlevoix & Escanaba road will be opened from Kalkaska to Mackinaw City, via Charlevoix and Petoskey, by next fall. It is expected that work will be begun early in the spring.

Action for $33,000 has been brought agains the owners of the propeller Vernon as the value of the vessels Senator and Watson and cargoes that were sunk last May by collision with the Vernon during a storm while entering St. Mary's river. The case was taken up in Detroit Friday.

There is only one brickyard in the Northern Peninsula and that is located at the Sault. A number of Detroit business men have decided to locate a yard near Marquette, and for this purpose have organized the Anna River Brick Company, the capital stock of which is $22,000.

The Bay View, Little Traverse & Mackinac Railroad, eight miles long, running from Bay View to Harbor Springs, around Little Traverse Bay, was sold last week Wednesday at commissioner's sale and the Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad Company were the purchasers at $36,700.

St. Ignace Republican says that ice bridges thereabouts are now solid and ready for business. [illegible] to Mackinac Island, Mackinac City, and Les Cheneaux islands. J. J. Nunn drove recently from Search Bay to St. Ignace, via Burnt Island, making the trip in six hours.

Kalamazoo Telegraph: When a man gets his head turned toward the public crib he is never satisfied until he gets there. Philip B. Watchel of Petoskey made a losing race for secretary of state against Gil Osmon. He tackled next the administration and has just received a crumb in the shape of a clerkship. Phillip is too good a man to be shelved in this way.

Joseph Devalin, Sr. was found frozen to death in a snow drift in the road between East Jordan and Central Lake. He had been at work at East Jordan and was on his way home in Central Lake township. The verdict of the jury was as follows: We find that deceased came to his death by being overcome with weariness and fatigue; that he laid down to rest and was frozen to death.

A young lady agent is in the city selling washing machines that require only to be set in the boiler with the clothes and a few pieces of soap—the machine does the washing without any further attention. Perhaps, in the sweet by-and-bye some one will invent a machine that will bring news to the reporters and obviate the necessity of chasing items for that class of workers on the press.—Marquette Mining Journal.

East Jordan Enterprise: On account of ill-health Miss Maud Loveday has been compelled to resign her position as teacher in the South Arm school. At the present time no successor has been selected.——John McGinnis, of Echo, well known at South Arm, has been missed from his home for the past week. Diligent search was made without success, until a day or two ago, when it was ascertained that he had been drowned in Intermediate Lake.

Our delegation of Northern Michigan Indians at Washington don't get what they went after. A recent Washington special says: "Representative Fisher has not been bothered by his tribe of Indians for the past two days. Mr. Skildbergosh and the rest of the delegation seem to have abandoned the trial. Mr. Fisher said today that the claim upon which they came to Washington has not sufficient basis, and that he advised them not to come. He says it is rather tough that he should have to clothe and transport the entire delegation, but that he would have no objection to fixing up one or two of these red constituents of his.

Cadillac News and Express: Dunham Bros'. crate factory is in full blast, and is turning out a car load of crating per week, five men and boys are required to do the work.——One hundred and twenty one thousand loaves of "bakers' bread" were sold by the baker of our city during the year 1887, and as several newly married persons have recently commenced housekeeping, and others are making arrangements to do likewise, the bakers are confidently expecting a good increase of trade for this year. Four thousand and two hundred beeves retalled through the butcher shops of Cadillac during the past year, the greater part of it being tenderloin steaks and choice roasting pieces.

Bay City Tribune: The logging railroad of David Ward, the pine king of Michigan, is now building. It will run from Frederica, on the Michigan Central, to Alba, on the G. R. & I. Thirteen miles are graded. The right-of-way is being lumbered, and from two to three million feet will be cut from it. The logs will be put into the Manistee. The road will penetrate Mr. Ward's great tract of cork pine, and enable him to bring it by rail to the Bay City market. The Ward railroad, connecting the two great systems that run to Mackinac, will give Bay City a short line to Petoskey and the summer resorts for which the west side of the State is famed. The Michigan Central will doubtless acquire possession of the Ward railroad, and in time operate it as a branch.

Petoskey Record: The vestry of Emmanuel Episcopal Church have, we understand, through Mr R. J. Cushman purchased the the lot on corner of Mitchel street and Waukazoo avenue, opposite the M. E. church whereupon they hope to erect a good church edifice in the near future.——A very important business change occured last week in the retirement of Mr. James Buckley from the firm of Buckley & Dagget, he disposing of his interest therein to Mr. A. M. Dagget. The new firm will be Dagget & Cook. The latter gentleman has had long experience in the hardware business, having been in a retail trade in Battle Creek for a number of years, and in the employ of the great house of Buhl, Ducharme & Co., Detroit, for five or six years past. Mr. Buckley will probably visit the south before delinately deciding upon his future business.

He Told Everything.

"When a young man," said Mr. Weed to a writer in [illegible], "I had to adopt a [illegible] method for strengthening my memory, and I hit on one that was very effective. I got married in 1818, when I was working in Albany as a journeyman printer. In a few months I went into business, establishing a newspaper for myself, and some of my friends thought I would succeed in politics, probably because I impressed my views strongly upon them about me. But I saw at once that I had a fatal weakness which I thought would prevent it. My memory was a sieve. I could remember nothing. Dates, names, appointments, faces, everything escaped me. I said to my wife: 'Catherine, I shall never make a successful politician, for I cannot remember, and that is a prime necessity of politicians. A politician who sees a man once should remember him forever.' My wife told me I must train my memory. So when I came home that night I sat down alone, and spent fifteen minutes trying silently to recall with accuracy the principal events of the day. I could remember but little at first; now I remember that I could not then recall what I had for breakfast.

"After a few days' practice I found I could recall more. Events came back to me more minutely, more accurately, and more vividly than at first. After a fortnight or so of this, Catherine said, 'Why don't you relate to me the events of the day, instead of recalling them to yourself?' It would be interesting, and my interest in it would be a stimulus to you. Having great respect for my wife's opinion, I began a habit of oral confession, as it were, which was continued for almost fifty years. Every night, the last thing before retiring, I told her everything I could remember that had happened to me, or about me, during the day. I generally recalled the very dishes I had had for breakfast, dinner and tea; the people I had seen and what they said; the editorials I had written for my paper, giving her brief abstracts of them: I mentioned all the letters I had sent and received, and the very language used, as nearly as possible; when I had walked or ridden I told her everything that had come within my observation. I found I could say my lessons better and better every year, and, instead of the practice becoming irksome, it became a pleasure to go over again the events of the day. I am indebted to this discipline for a memory of somewhat unusual tenacity, and I recommend the practice to all who wish to store up facts, or expect to have much to do with influencing men."

The late Bishop Stevens used to write poetry when he was in college, and not poor poetry, either.

A QUEER BARGAIN.

Well, you see, said Cousin Sally Baker, when the railroad people first came along here with their queer machines a-layin' out the new track, we were all mightily exercised about it. Some took one view and some another. Some was pleased, and said t'would open up a market to us and increase the vally o' land; whilst others allowed that the farms would be ruined, and the wheat fields set afire, the cattle run over and killed, and the noise itself be an abidin' noosance.

I tell you some of em' was real mad, but the reddest of the hull lot was undeniably Betsey Ann Simcoe.

She was a single, unmarried woman about 40 or more, and lived on a poor little place of her own, just above the Cross-Keys tavern.

'Twas only two or three acres of gravelly land, with a two-room frame house on it. Folks said she had a leetle money hid away somewhere, for she was powerful sharp at making bargains, and held a tight grip on all she got hold of, but, all the same, she made a great talk about poverty, as an excuse for not giving none to the missionary society and for repairs to the meeting-house.

Still she seemed to get along's well as anybody with her garden, and her cow, and her poultry, and the little gal she'd 'prenticed from the city's poor-house to help do chores.

She wasn't a bad-tempered woman in gen'ral, but I tell you she was mighty riled up the day the railroad folks come to her house and told her they were survey'n the track and that it would hev to run straight through her house.

She raced up then and 'lowed the property was hers, and nobody had a right to so much as set a foot on it without her consent. They were civil enough, and explained, and said they was willing to pay double the vally o' the hull property for the privilege of running the road through.

She wouldn't hear it, but out o' sheer contraryness refused every offer, though everybody could see that her mouth watered at the very mention of the money.

She said she'd never give up her home, and if they run their injine through the house 'twould be over her mangled body. And she wound up by threatening if they didn't quit in a short time, she'd have them arrested for trespass on her premises.

Well, the next day she went down to Hobb's Holler to see her cousin, Lucindy Parks, and talk over the railroad business. Lucindy and the rest tried to convince her that she'd get the best o' the bargain by letting the railroad company have the land; but she 'lowed she'd not be turned out o' doors to 'commodate a passel o' sassy men folks that cared for nothing but their own good. She stayed two days at Lucindy's, and then went back to her own house at Cross-Keys. Least ways, she went to where she'd left her house standing, but when she came in sight of it, 'twas gone, and nothin' of it left but a lot o' wood and ashes.

Then there was a row! Betsey Ann accused the railroad folks of burning her house, and threatened to persecute 'em by the law. They 'lowed they could prove by the neighbors that it had been done accidentally by a passel o' tramps who camped on the place the night she was away, and made a fire in the woodshed to roast some of her chickens for supper. When the chips and wood caught and set fire to the house, they got skeered and made short tracks out o' Cross-Keys. Betsey Ann was convinced the railroad folks knew more about these tramps than they chose to let on. But she didn't say much—only dropped a little hint that she'd be even with them bimeby.

They offered to build her another house if she'd give up the land. She said she'd consider of it and let 'em know. Purty soon they come to an agreement, by which, besides paying well for the land, they was to build her a two-story, four-room frame house, and likewise allow her to travel free on the road for the rest of her life whenever she wanted to, with a female companion along.

At first they objected to the companion; but when she explained that she was a lone woman and couldn't think of exposing herself to the attentions of strange men by traveling unprotected, they laughed and agreed to put in that condition along with the rest, which was done, and the papers made out and signed and sealed according to law. You see, they'd hearn the neighbors laffing at the idea of Miss Simcoe ever travelin' on the railroad—she had skeercely been further from home than Hobbs' Hollar or Bowling Green meetin' house in all her life and was most afeard to trust herself out o' sight of her own house.

Well, the company kept their word, and run up a two-story, four-room frame house for Betsey Ann—sech as it was. She declared 'twas nothing better than a shanty, that wouldn't keep out the Summer's heat nor Winter's cold, and was liable to be blown away by the first high wind that came along. The company said they hadn't stipulated for the exact way the house was to be built, and they'd done the best they could afford to do, and she ought to be satisfied. She shut up then, but set her jaw in a way she had of her own when she'd made up her mind to something she didn't care to talk about just yet.

At last the road was finished, and one day everybody turned out to see the injine for the first time, come tearin' and fizzin' up to Cross-Keys. Betsey Ann Simcoe, she looked on, with a kind o' smile of triumph, for all the world's if the hull concern belonged to her. Every time the train passed she came out and looked at it till she got used to seeing it and hearing its unearthly noise. And then one day she took her little white help along, and got aboard the cars and rode up to the next station, as she said to see how it felt and how she liked it. Next week she went agin as far as Cloverdale, and a little after made another trip, 'long with her cousin, Lucindy Parks clear up to the city.

Purty soon she got to be known to all the railroad folks along the line, and there was no end to the jokes about her.

"By gosh!" says old Mr. Potter to one o' the conductors, one day. "I'm thinking you'll hev to fix up a car for her spe-shal commodation, if it goes on this way longer."

"Oh," answered he, a-smiling, "it's a novelty to her at present, but we don't object. After awhile, when her curiosity's gratified, she'll be content to settle down at home agin, and talk over her travels."

Well, she did stay quite for a week or two, and then took agin to riding on the rail. First she went to Cloverdale to buy a tin kittle for 10 cents which she said was a saving of 5 cents from gitten it at Cross-Keys.

Then she left her gal at home and tuck Lucindy Parks along, all the way to the city to sell her eggs and buy a caliker gownd; and so it went all the Summer.

"Oh, never mind," says the conductor, smiling a hard kind of smile. "She'll get tired of travelin' after a while."

But she didn't seem to get tired. On the contrary she took to making regular trips, taking along first one person and then another, until the conductors got to looking as grum as bears, and even the firemen and injineers scowled or laughed every time she put in an appearance.

One injineer used to let off a fearful schreech o' the whistle whenever he seed her coming; but, after the first scare, she got used to it and tuck no notice.

And once when she was late, and the conductor started the train just as she and Lucindy Parks was about climbing aboard, she threatened to sue the company if it happened agin.

They knew she'd keep her word, so they was all obliged to be on their good behavior to her.

So she kept it up all the first year or two; Her way was to get aboard with her female companion, whoever it might be for the time, and jest fix herself comfortably near the stove or at a window, 'cording as it was Summer or Winter, and thar sit and knit the whole journey through.

She'd carry one woman up maybe, and bring another down, and at last it came out that she was makin' a regular business of it, with folks that wanted to visit the town or country, they paying her a half and a quarter the regular fare on what was passed off on the railroad folks for a free trip.

The company interfered then, and said something about stopping it by law; but she 'lowed they hadn't stiperlated 'bout any business matters o'hern, and she was keeping to the letter of agreement.

Then they tried to buy her off, but she said she was satisfied as things was and wanted no change. Still, it was clear that she was not only making money for herself but keeping the company out of it.

There was one injineer named Wells on one of the trains, and bimeby, when this had been going on a matter of four or five years, Betsey Ann Simcoe noticed that he always tetched his cap and looked at her in a soft, spooney sort o' way whenever he seen her.

One day, when she was standing on the bank, he flung a bokey of pinks and bachelder-buttons to her feet, and another time pitched her a pound o' candy.

Then he handed her a newspaper with some verses in it marked with charcoal—something about his heart being captivated by a lady "over the way" that he'd never spoken to; and at last came a letter saying as how he'd seen her so often on the cars, and he was sure she would make him the good, clever, sensible wife he'd always wanted, if she could only bring herself to fancy him as he did her.

Well, she answered the letter, and a meeting was fixed, but meantime one o' the railroad chaps stepped in and told her that Wells was getting so dissipated that the company talked of discharging him, but she might be able to save him only on condition that he'd give up going to bar-rooms.

He considered of it and said he would if she'd promise to give up her railroad traveling and stay at home and make it comfortable and agreeable for him and her.

So they both put it down in black and white, and got witnesses to it, and took oath to keep their words, and then they was married.

Of course Betsy Ann Wells stayed at home now, and set about doing all she could to make it pleasant for her husband. She had plenty of time to do it, for he didn't make his appearance there once a month, skeersely; and at last she found out that it was all a put-up job of the company's who'd bribed Wells with $800 to marry her off the road for good.

He was a reckless sort of a chap, but not bad, and had always been as sober and free from bar-rooms as a judge.

Betsy Ann was awful cut up when she found it out, for she'd set her heart on him, as old maids are apt to set their hearts on the first man that purtends to keer for 'em.

She didn't say nothing, even to Lucindy Parks, but went right along doing the best she could to make it pleasant for her husband whenever he came to see her.

And at last, when he met with an accident from a collision on the road, and had to be laid up for weeks before he got well again, she had him from the hospital and nursed him as tender and keerful as a mother does her ailing baby.

And would you believe it, that in time she brought the man round to be ashamed of the trick he'd played on her, and to be just as steady and easy-going a husband as any in Cross-Keys?

Betsy Ann Wells never went on the rails again, except once or twice with her husband, paying her own fare.

And once she told the conductor that spite of everything the company had done, she'd got the best of the bargain, a good husband and money enough to make him and her comfortable for life.—Susie Allen Wells.

RANDALL KNOCKED OUT.

Beaten in His Stronghold—Kisner to Head the Pennsylvania Democratic State Committee.

"THE last three days have been very cold ones for Samuel J. Randall," says a Philadelphia dispatch to the Chicago Daily News.

The fight for delegates to the State convention on Monday was a hand-to-hand struggle and the most bitter fight for years, and the Randall faction failed to get on top. The administration has elected a majority of the delegates. Randall fought hard and succeeded in carrying his own division, but that was all, the others going decidedly against him. This defeat of Randall in the citadel of his strength is considered an unprecedented and entirely unlooked-for ending of the battle. To make things worse the Randall faction was emphatically wiped out at the meeting of the State committee at Harrisburg. Dallas Sanders, the former Chairman of the Democratic State Committee, was Randall's man, and the Randall faction would hard to get him re-elected. Elliott P. Kisner represented the administrationists, headed by Scott and Cassidy, ... to compromise by withdrawing Sanders if the other side would withdraw Kisner, but the Kisner people would not accept. The result was that Kisner was elected.

... cratic primaries to the conventions which are to elect delegates to the State Convention, at which delegates to the National Convention will be chosen. This is the worst defeat Sam Randall has ever received. There is no concealment of the fact that the administration is making open war on the great protectionist, and the opinion is fully held that he will "have to go."

PERISHED BY SCORES.

THE terrible storm which swept over the Northwest last week was the worst blizzard experienced since 1873. The victims of its fury are counted by the scores. From Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, and Montana came pitiful stories of suffering and death from the icy blast which swept down from the regions of Boreas. The wind blew at the rate of fifty miles an hour, and the snow, fine as powder, was hurled along by the gale. On the prairie an object forty feet distant could not be seen. A man's voice could not be heard six feet distant. The air was full of snow as fine as flour, and the roaring of the wind and the darkness caused by so much snow in the air made the scene the most dismal, drear and forsaken that men ever looked upon. Every railroad in Dakota and Minnesota and many in Iowa, Nebraska and Wisconsin were blocked. Telegraph wires everywhere were down, and it was not until Sunday night that the awful results of the storm became known. The following is the list of deaths so far received, while fifty more persons are missing:

In Dakota—Emil Hilbertson, at Hitchcock, a Sioux Falls man, two sons of William Driver, at Raymond, two Mitchell youths, Emma Lamar, Carrie Anman, William P. MARKET REPORTS.

SCORED BY CLEVELAND.

A Message by the President Accompanies the Pacific Commissioners' Report.

Nearly a Hundred and Eighty Millions Advanced to the Roads by Uncle Samuel.

Directors of the Companies Now Excusing Their Course in Absorbing Most of the Assets.

Congress Advised to Take the Case in Hand and Compel Settlement.

The following is the President's message transmitting the Pacific Railroad reports to Congress:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

On March 3 last an act was passed authorizing the appointment of three Commissioners who should investigate such railroads as have received aid from the United States Government. Among other things, the contemplated investigation included a history of the construction of these roads, their relations and indebtedness to the Government, and the question whether in the interest of the United States any extension of the time for the performance of the obligations of said roads to the Government should be granted, and if so, the said Commissioners were directed to submit a scheme for such extension. The Commissioners were further directed by said act to report in full to the President upon all the matters submitted to them, and he was, by said act, required to forward said report to Congress, with such recommendations or comments as he should see fit to make in the premises.

The commissioners, immediately after their selection, entered upon the discharge of their duties, and have prosecuted their inquiries with commendable industry, intelligence, and thoroughness. A large amount of testimony has been taken, and all the facts have been developed which appear to be necessary for the consideration of the questions arising from the condition of these aided railroads and their relations to the Government. The commissioners have, however, been unable to agree upon the manner in which these railroads should be treated respecting their indebtedness ...

... interest, calculated to the maturity of the bonds, added to the principal, produces an aggregate of $178,884,759. Against these amounts there has been repaid by the companies the sum of $30,955,633. It is almost needless to state that the companies have availed themselves to the utmost extent of the permission given them to issue their bonds and to mortgage their property to secure the payment of the same by an incumbrance having preference of the government lien and precisely equal to it in amount. It will be seen that there was available for the building of each mile of these roads $32,000 in bonds of the companies, secured by a first mortgage on all their property and ten sections of Government land, to say nothing of the stock of the companies. When the relations created between the Government and these companies by the legislation referred to is considered, it is astonishing that the claim should be made that the directors of these roads owed no duty except to themselves in their construction; that they regarded no interest but their own, and that they were justified in contracting with themselves and making such bargains as resulted in conveying to their pockets all the assets of the company. As a lienor the Government was vitally interested in the amount of the mortgage to which its security had been subordinated, and it had the right to insist that none of the bonds secured by this prior mortgage should be issued fraudulently or for the purpose of division among these stockholders without consideration. The doctrine of complete independence on the part of the directors of these companies and their freedom from any obligation to care for any other interest but their own in the construction of these roads seemed to have developed the natural consequences of its application, portrayed as follows in the majority report of the commissioners:

"The result is that those who have controlled and directed the construction and development of these companies have become possessed of their surplus assets, the release of bonds, stocks, and payment of dividends voted by themselves, while the great creditor, the United States, finds itself substantially without adequate security for repayment of its loans."

The laws enacted in aid of these roads, while they illustrated a generous liberality and a generous disregard of the Government's advantages, which it is hoped experience has corrected, were nevertheless passed upon the theory that the roads should be constructed according to the common rules of business fairness and duty, and that their value and ability to pay their debts should not be impaired by unfair manipulation, and when the Government subordinated its lien to another it was in the expectation that the prior lien would represent in its amount only such bonds as might be necessarily issued by the companies for the construction of their roads at fair prices agreed upon in an honest way between real and substantial parties. For the purpose of saving or improving the security afforded by its junior lien, the Government should have the right now to purge this paramount lien of all that is fraudulent, fictitious, or unconscionable. If the transfer to innocent hands of bonds of this character secured by such lien ...

Hanging of Henry Schmidt, the Young Murderer, at West Union, Iowa.

He Makes a Statement on the Scaffold, Saying He Was Hired to Do the Deed.

Henry Schmidt, the second man to die at the hands of the hangman in Iowa in the last twenty years, was hanged at West Union on Friday, the 13th inst., for the murder of Lucretia Peck. He was also charged with having murdered Abram, the husband of Lucretia Peck, and with having shot and attempted to kill Abram Leonard at the same time.

Schmidt was taken to West Union from the Penitentiary at Anamosa on Tuesday, the 10th inst., and from that time up to the hour of his execution he occupied himself in conversing freely and pleasantly with acquaintances, reading the newspapers, and smoking cigarettes. He looked calmly upon his impending doom and declared he would die bravely. He displayed a strong aversion to newspaper men, for the reason that he believed they had misrepresented him. The only press representative that he consented to receive was an acquaintance of his in West Union. To him he related nothing particularly new. He told over again his connection with the crime, declaring that he was hired for $500 by Ellison T. Smith to murder Leonard; that he would not have killed Mrs. Peck had she not got in his way, and that Ellison T. Smith killed Mr. Peck by beating him to death with a club near the gate. He said $500 was too strong a temptation for him. He declared himself willing to die for the murder of Mrs. Peck, but he thought Ellison T. Smith should also be hanged for killing her husband. Schmidt was only 20 years old.

About forty persons witnessed the hanging. Schmidt was escorted to the scaffold by Sheriff O'Neil and addressed a few remarks to the crowd before him. ...

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE PAST.

BY S. MOORE.

Sometimes my fancy wanders back
Adown my life's long trodden track,
And distant scenes of long ago,
When my young heart was all aglow,
Come back ... and bright
As ... they gave delight.

Indulging in my waking dreams,
I linger by the crystal stream,
And watch the pretty speckled trout
Bask in the sun, or frisk about,
Perhaps would dip my rod with care,
Some unsuspecting trout to snare.

The old green lane—I love it yet—
Where daisy, primrose, violet
Beneath the hedgerows richly bloom
And scent the air with sweet perfume,
While robin sings his sweetest song
To cheer me as I pass along.

O, happy were those summer days,
And beautiful the sunny braes
Where we, loved brothers, often strayed,
Or loitered in the sylvan shade,
Anon would seek a change of scene
And race and frolic on the green.

In autumn we ran off together
And wandered through the blooming heather—
The honey-scented heather, where
We knew the ripe bilberries were,
How grand the heather-bells around!
How sweet the berries which we found!

The village school—I see it still,
Where first I learned to wield the quill,
My schoolmates still seem boys as when
Their years were only eight or ten.
How changed I were I to see them now
With hoary head and wrinkled brow.

In later years, with cheerful toil,
I helped to cultivate the soil,
The varied labors of the farm
Had such a fascinating charm
That passing time ne'er drooped his wing;
In summer, autumn, winter, spring.

But, oh, ... years there came
A ... wealth and fame,
And so I left the dear old home
Resolved ... foreign lands to roam,
And in those distant climes so fair
I built my castles in the air.

Most of my hopes have been destroyed,
Yet life has not been all a void
... providence has been my stay
Throughout my life's eventful day,
And glowing hopes of future rest
Still soothe and cheer my troubled breast.

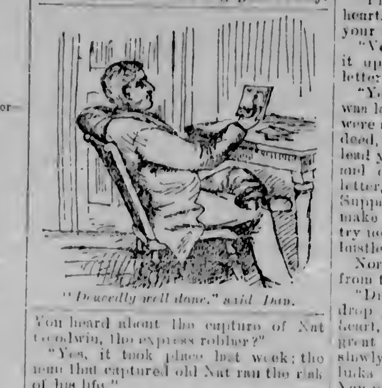
... detective in the West. They say he used to be a scout and that he knows the ins and outs of these old mountains like an Indian, and then has influence over the Indians, why, they tell me they are all his friends; that he has lived with them for weeks, and talks their languages in several dialects, and besides he's the best rider and shot in the country."

Dan Le Fane fidgeted slightly and said somewhat anxiously:

"You have no idea, though, that he agreed to look into the case of Miss Fairleigh's, have you?"

"Oh, I think not, and besides he has run to ground several big game lately.



"Deucedly well done," said Dan.

You heard about the capture of Nat Goodwin, the express robber?"

"Yes, it took place last week; the man that captured old Nat ran the risk of his life."

"Of course he did, but Claire was the man who did it. Ah, a wonderful being he is in, truth, a wonderful being."

"Now to return to business. When can you bring young Gray around? I do not care to be troubled with the heralds, and if he's got the cash why he's the ...

... they told me you had gone back East."

"Did you, indeed? How very kind! Yes, I did go back to Virginia, hoping to discover some proof of my father's marriage and my birth; for, oh! Mrs. Clifton, I know I was really and truly his daughter. They have stolen my fortune and robbed me of my name, my birthright."

"But who is this Dan Le Fane, the new claimant, the pretended cousin?"

"I do not know; but he gave the lawyer conclusive proof of his claim, and he does resemble papa somewhat, in spite of his cruel face and cruel heart."

"Poor little girl! But don't lose heart. Could you learn nothing of your father's past?"

"Very little; but I shall never give it up. Mrs. Clifton, have there any letters come to you for me, lately?"

"Yes, one. I was surprised that it was left in my care; but I hoped you were on your way to visit me, as, indeed, was true. Here it is; but let me lead you to your room, you are weary and dusty; you can there read your letter, and freshen yourself up a bit. Supper time will soon be here. Now make yourself quite comfortable, and try not to fret." And kind Mrs. Clifton bustled away.

Nora tore open her letter; it was from the detective, as she expected.

"DEAR MISS FAIRLEIGH: I merely drop you a line to keep you in good heart, for it takes time to accomplish great things, sometimes, and I work slowly, but I think I am welding the links of the chain together solidly. You may see me some time when you least expect it, and don't be discouraged. Yours very truly, R. C."

Nora placed the letter in the blaze of the small fire that, owing to the chill in the autumn nights, had been kindled, and proceeded to get ready, the best she could, for supper.

Old Soldiers Rehearsing the Stirring Scenes Through Which They Passed.

Anecdotes of the Battle-Field, the Camp-Fire, and the Merry March.

All.

BY FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE.

THERE hangs a saber, and there a rein,
With rusty buckle and green curb-chain;
A pair of spurs on the old gray wall,
And a moldy saddle—well, that is all.

Come out to the stable; it is not far
The moss-grown door is hanging ajar.
Look within! There's an empty stall,
Where once stood a charger—and that is all.

The good black steed came riderless home,
Flecked with blood drops as well as foam;
Do you see that mound, where the dead leaves fall?
The good black horse pined to death—that's all.

All? O God! it's all I can speak.
Question me not—I am old and weak.
His saddle and saber hang on the wall,
And his horse pined to death—I have told you all.

A Tragic Incident.

JUST as I was sighting one of the guns of my battery on the first day of attack on Mobile, I heard my name called by one at my side, a midshipman, whose activity and officer-like conduct I had noticed at the time ...

... of shell and shot among them, that the innocent, feeble, and helpless were even in more danger than the garrison soldiers who stood behind their entrenchments, and often I fancied ... heart's blood curdled with the fancy that I could hear the shrieks of wounded and dying women—that the pitiful cries of poor children were borne down upon the breeze. I could almost see them crushed, mangled, dying, dead! Oh, God save me from ever witnessing the bombardment of any inhabited city at least; if so, let there be none but men within its walls.

When the city had capitulated, I entered with the rest who were sent to take formal possession, and found the street which led toward the quay facing the point where we were directed to march led directly past the house which George had pointed out as that of Don Corralla. As I looked upon the blackened walls I felt a strong anxiety to enter it and try and find out the fate of George's betrothed, and obtained leave for a few minutes from my Captain. I hastily entered through the ruined archway which opened into the court-yard, which always centers a Spanish-built palace, and saw at a glance that George had been before me in his visit. The basin of a large fountain was in the midst, but the aqueducts which had supplied the city fountain were cut off, and this was dry. By its verge, however, on a broad slab of marble, sat George, and she in his arms. I paused for an instant as I saw him and the beautiful form which he held, for I thought it indelicate to advance at that moment, but I could not retreat, and there seemed something so strange in his actions that I could not well tear myself away.

He held her still and motionless in his arms, her long black hair fell in disheveled ...

... the soldiers, pointing to a fresh mound of earth in the garden.

"It's a reb's," he replied, "one that was killed in the fight the ... had here."

"And you buried him, did you?" asked the soldier.

"Yes, buried him myself. They left him in the road out there, just as he fell."

"That is all right; but why did you bury him in the garden? Why did you make a graveyard out of your rose garden."

"Well, it was the wimmen that wanted it so. You see, stranger," and the old man's voice trembled and grew husky, "I had a boy once. He went out with the Pennsylvania Reserves, and fout 'long with McClellan's men down on the Chickahominy swamps. One day a letter come. It was writ by a woman, and she told us how a battle had been fought near her house while she and other women lay in the cellar all day. When the battle was over the women come out, found our Johnny there, his hair all bloody and tangled in the grass. So they digged a grave in the soft earth in their garden, and buried my boy right among the flowers, for the sake of the mother who would never see him again. So, when I see that poor reb a lyin' out there, all dead, and bloody, and covered with dust, I said I'd bury him. And the women, they said, 'Yes, father, bury him among the roses.' That's why I did it, stranger." And the poor old father's voice failed him, and the tears coursed each other down his faded cheek.

The soldiers were affected by the old man's story, and one of them assured him that he appreciated the love he bore for his son, and the act in return for the favor of the Southern ladies.

"Yes, stranger," said he, "that little mound ...

Probability of a Great Race for the League Pennant This Year.

Matters in the American Association—A New Use for Old Wagon Tongues.

[CHICAGO CORRESPONDENCE.]

Notwithstanding that the ball parks of our Northern cities are to-day covered with a thick coating of snow and ice, it will now be but a few weeks before the professional players of the country will begin to report at their respective headquarters for the championship season of 1888. Already the players who went to California last fall for the winter are beginning to straggle into Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, Boston and Detroit, and by February 15 it is safe to say that all will have determined to enter into training for the work ahead. It will not, therefore, be too early, but on the contrary interesting to many lovers of the game, to take a glance over the field with a view to determining, as far as possible, the outlook for this year's fight for the pennant.

In the American Association affairs seem to be far from settled. The team that for three years past has walked away with the championship, and not half tried at that, the St. Louis Browns, has been broken up and almost disbanded, so that the team which will represent the Mound City this year will be an almost entirely new one. ...

FIRST ANNUAL BANQUET

Of the Charlevoix Business Men's Association, on Monday Night Last.

If a stranger had been permitted to look down from the descending stairway of the Bridge Street House dining room upon the spread there presented Monday night, there would have been no doubt in his mind as to the business quality of the Charlevoix business men.

The banquet was a most stupendous success in every particular. Ticket holders began to arrive soon after seven, and before eight the parlors were crowded. At nine the signal was given to move to the dining-room, and with the system which had been arranged by the management, about one hundred were seated without an unpleasant incident occurring to mar the festive event.

The menu embraced four courses, and was abundant and creditable to those upon whom the duty devolved of providing for so large a number. A subsequent spread made the total number at 125 who were provided for.

After being called to order by President L. D. Bartholomew, Rev. A. O. Downs pronounced the invocation, the banquet following, which occupied an hour.

THE TOASTS.

Hon. John Nicholls was the toast master, and as the last course disappeared, that gentleman announced the following toasts successively:

Charlevoix, her advantages and opportunities. The Queen of the Lakes, she showers her wealth of forest, soil, waters, scenery and climate upon us, and bids us be loyal in maintaining her supremacy. Long live the Queen.

Responded to by A. D. Cruickshank.

The Village Newspaper. The embodiment of truth, the encyclopedia of the neighborhood, the inspiration to all that is noble and useful. How could we do without it?

Responded to by C. J. Strang.

Shorter Hours and Better Pay. What we all want. Why shouldn't we have them?

Responded to by G. W. Jeffries.

The Business Men's Association. Labor is organized, capital is organized, the church is organized, everything else is organized; why should not the business men organize to foster their interests and the interests of their town?

Responded to by R. W. Kane.

The Ladies. They bewitch us in youth, they sustain us in manhood, they comfort us in old age. The best bargain any man makes is when he obtains a true, sensible and loving wife.

Responded to by Hon. E. H. Green.

THE MUSIC.

The music was a strong and artistic feature of the entertainment, and embraced the following programme:

1. Piano Trio, Mrs. Guyles, Mrs. Kane and Miss Cochran.
2. Vocal Duet, W. A. Smith and Miss Florence Smith.
3. Vocal Solo, Mrs. F. W. Mayne.
4. Quartette, Mrs. Downs, Mrs. E. M. Clark, Dr. Carlstein and Mr. Mills Kanagy.
5. Vocal Trio, Mesdames Hines, Clark and Kane.
6. Piano Solo, Mrs. A. T. Washburn.

The event in all its features was one long to be remembered, not only in the annals of the Association, but in the social history of Charlevoix.

—Concerning the probable stage of water next season it may yet be too early to speculate, yet the existing condition of things cannot fail to have an important bearing upon the near future and influence freight rates, and Pine Lake shipping. R. M. Wagstaff, the government harbormaster at Sand Beach, Lake Huron, writes: "The water is 16 inches lower now than it was in July, which was the highest month." Capt. Smith Moore, who recently paid a visit to the Sault, wrote wrote from that point as follows: "The water is very low at the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. Boats cannot get through in the spring with more than 14 feet. Most of the canalmen think that 13½ feet of water is all that there will be here this spring." Low water will cause a cutting down in cargoes of all large carriers to the extent of several hundred tons each, and thus neutralize the immediate effect of the addition of a large amount of new tonage as now promised for next season. The Cleveland Leader says that the reduction of carrying capacity on account of low water is causing owners to proceed with caution lest they contract to bring down more tons than they will be able to. At Cleveland it is estimated by well-informed vesselmen that the low water may more than offset the new tonnage of the the present year. At all events from reports received from different sources it seems likely to seriously reduce the tonnage of the lakes.

There is nothing that will knock free tradeism out of a man so completely as a thorough understanding of the subject. Therefore let everybody read and study both sides.

The Beaman-Cooper Wedding.

The marriage of George W. Beaman, formerly of East Jordan, to Miss Adah Cooper, of Marion, last Wednesday evening at the home of the bride's parents, was an exceedingly pleasant event, and one which called forth the best wishes of friends both here and elsewhere. The wedding was comparatively private, only the relatives and most intimate friends of the contracting parties being present. The ceremony was briefly performed by Rev. W. H. McCartney; Miss Mate Cooper acting as bridesmaid, while Geo. A. Wilson officiated as groomsman. After the reception a very enjoyable and sociable evening was spent, and the guests departed with the hope that long lines of usefulness and prosperity may be given the young pair. Mr. and Mrs. Beaman will be "at home" to their many friends in the Crouter rooms over Mr. B's drug store. The SENTINEL extends best wishes for future happiness.

General and Political.

Democratic and Mugwump papers call attention to the large sum to be appropriated for pensions this year, and argue that it shows the great love of Cleveland's administration for the soldiers. Can they explain how the administration could help itself?

Mayor Timothy Nester, of Marquette, says the upper pinlnsula republicans will pull harmoniously together with Seymour as the Congressional candidate, notwithstanding the long contest in convention, and that Seymour will easily be elected over Breen.

There is no country in the world that is suffering as much from foreign competition as free trade England. And she is squealing over it most earnestly. Her people are divided as to the best means of relief. Some demand protection by a tariff on imports while the lords and capitalists seek relief from outside. They are anxiously waiting for this country to adopt free trade and relieve their distress. But this country has enough to do to look out for itself.

Chicago Northwestern Lumberman: Walnut, ash and whitewood will boom during 1888, and quartered and plain oak, cherry and mohogany will please take seats in the rear.——Ash is holding its own, and as it grows scarcer, like walnut, its popularity increases. There is always a demand for what is scarce and hard to get.——One of the largest lumbering concerns in the state is that of Henry Stephens & Co., of St. Helen, also operating mills at Waters and Bagley, all on the line of the Mackinac division of the Michigan Central. Their cut during 1887 was 59,590,669 feet. They had on hand January 1, 53,861,752 feet. Their logs in lake January 1, 1888 footed up 9,200,000. They intend to cut 54,000,000 feet of lumber in 1888.——The revival in shipbuilding during the past year along the great chain of lakes, is reported to have resulted in the construction of a total of 53 vessels with a total tonage of 63,732 tons, valued at $5,817,000.

Chicago Journal: What the industrial, commercial and transportation intrests of this country need is an unbroken ship and steamer canal from the Gulf of Mexico to Lake Michigan, and from Lake Michigan through the state of Michigan to Lake Erie, connecting with the Erie canal and the Hudson River to the sea board. In order to establish such a great continuous ship and steam waterway all that is necessary is to connect the Mississippi and the Illinois rivers with Lake Michigan, construct a ship canal through the State of Michigan, and deepen and widen the Erie canal. Next to the creation of a formidable navy and the strengthening of our national defenses, we know of no better use that our treasury surplus could be put to than this. It would give the great central west two great waterway outlets to the ocean—one by way of New Orleans and the other by way of New York—and would do more to facilitate and regulate transportation and cheapen freight rates than can ever be effected by any other Congressional legislation.

Local option creates little stir in this town, for the people "boosted" the saloon years ago; yet we know of its accursed fruits, by bitter experience and let us help our neighbors North, South and East of us, to the same freedom from its evils which we have enjoyed since its extermination here.

Since, in the past, parents and patrons of our schools have manifested so much interest in school-work by being present at the "general exercises," though home duties have suffered sometimes, on Friday evening, Feb. 10th, at 7:30 o'clock the exercises will be conducted in the Grammar room of the school-building, that all may have an opportunity to be present; And the teachers renew the oft-repeated invitation to be present and encourage them and the pupils by your manifest interest. A fee of 15 cents will be required of those not parents or guardians; proceeds to go toward furnishing a school library which is needed very badly. This is not a school exhibition, but a regular school exercise rendered in the evening.

[We were just going to, Phil.] Well, we have just passed through the worst storm I ever saw. It struck us about 12 o'clock, noon, and raged fiercely until next morning. There were several lives lost around here, and lots of stock. My house was crowded with people, storm-bound for three days; no trains. We kept fires all night, and got through without anything serious happening here. Do not know how it was with my stock on the farm twenty miles from here.

Harper's Weekly is still very hopeful. It thinks the Democratic party is too cowardly to walk on the platform laid down by the President. It says, "The majority does not mean that that its party shall enter upon the Presidential campaign as a free trade party, and there is no way in which the party can be forced to take that position. It seems now to be pretty clear that the President, not a policy, will be the platform.

—Get to the polls on the 14th and vote for local option. Let us try the experiment of getting along without the saloons. Let us see if it won't help business instead of hurt it, as some claim. Let us see if there won't be more comfort for wives and little ones; more money for bread and butter, shoes and stockings, and less for whisky; more nights of sound rest for anxious mothers, and more money Saturday night to cheer their good old hearts. Let us see if the $300 per saloon which now comes to the public treasury will not come to us in some other way. Let us vote for local prohibition and see if we shall not enjoy the happy reflection of having done our duty to ourselves, our sons and to society.

—The executive board of Good Templars society held a council at Lansing recently. At the afternoon meeting the secretary's report was read and showed that there are 172 lodges in the state with a combined membership of 6,000. Twenty-one new lodges have been started during the past three months. The treasurer's report shows the order to be in a financially prosperous condition. A course of study for Good Templars was decided upon. Before the final adjournment a revision was made in the new digest. The council expected to decide upon the adoption of the R. W. G. —The Charlevoix Manufacturing Company have arranged to enlarge the scope of their business by adding to their factory a shingle machine with a capacity of 25,000 per day. The Company began buying bolts Monday, of which they want 1,000 cords. This is a sensible move, and will pay.

Mr Harwood, of Banks, recently received papers from his old home in England, in which was chronicled the killing of a pig in Cornwall, only 8 months old, which weighed 240 pounds dressed. He desires his old Cornish neighbors to know that here in this part of America we do greater things then that. On Saturday last Mr. Harwood brought a dressed pig to McLeod's market which tipped the scales at 311½ and it was but nine months old—a month older than the Cornish shoat, to be sure; but 71 pounds heaver.

One thing at a time is enough. Local prohibition is the question of the hour until after the 14th. About the time this matter is disposed of the SENTINEL will be heard from concerning a festering evil that exists right here in our beautiful town—an importation from the interior—an evil as much worse than an open saloon as a skulking, venomous copperhead snake is worse than its fellow which strikes only after a warning rattle. An open saloon is a sanctuary of purity beside the moonshine den which educates gamblers and runs its tables not only at all hours of the day and night, but on the Sabbath! The young men are in greater danger from this hydra-headed monster of iniquity than they are from the saloon, and the SENTINEL proposes to make the atmosphere at this end of Bridge street warm on this subject until the people take the matter in hand and make short work of it. The SENTINEL is never happier than when it has a good square toed fight on its hands, especially when it is intrenched behind the bulwarks of right! We propose to stir this matter up from the bottom.

Manitoulin Islands are a part of the provincial dominion of Her Most Gracious Majesty, and we hereby serve notice upon Sir John A. MacDonald that Bill Downer is, notwithstanding the fact that he is in the tie business and a Democrat, an American citizen, and under the protection which our glorious Constitution guarantees to every man who behaves himself becomingly. Therefore should any indignity fall upon his person, from foreign hands, the fishery question will pale into insignificance beside the diplomatic muddle that would ensue. No nonsense will be tolerated. We want a square deal in that cedar transaction, or Mr. Bayard will send the iron-clad war steamer Michigan into Georgian Bay with sealed instructions to open her two smooth bores on Manitoulin Island and blow it into Lower Canada. This is no fish-bait or herring scale, but a question involving the sacred person of a citizen of two States in this great Republic. Mister MacDonald, you hear us! There is another feature of the case worthy of notice. Manitoulin Island is where the Indians and half-breeds annually observe the ceremony of "killing the devil." We trust that there will be no mistake made, and that Mr. Downer will return to his [illegible].

Mrs Crouter's Funeral.

In our last issue we chronicled the death of Mrs. Dr. Crouter. At the time of closing our columns the remains had not arrived here.

Late Tuesday afternoon the escort of Charlevoix Odd Fellows arrived from Petoskey with the body in charge, and accompanied by Dr. Crouter and J. A. Auld, a brother of deceased. The remains were deposited in the front parlor of Dr. Carlstein's residence, where the ladies assumed charge of them, and where they received many fine floral offerings. The Ladies' Aid Society of the M. E. church received by express from Grand Rapids a collection of cut flowers, which were tastefully arranged for the casket.

Dr. Crouter remained the guest of Dr. Carlstein, where many of his neighbors and friends called to utter words of sympathy.

At one o'clock Wednesday brief services were held at the residence, under the direction of the Odd Fellows, and at two the funeral services occurred at the M. E. church. Potted plants covered the altar rail, and cut flowers were upon the casket in various designs. The Rev. W. G. Clark opened the services with prayer. Rev. W. H. McCartney, pastor of the deceased, followed in a brief and touching address. Father Inwood closed with prayer. The music consisted of three appropriate selections, rendered by members of three church choirs.

The church was crowded to its utmost capacity—many from a distance being among the congregation—A. J. Stroud and wife, of Horton's Bay, being among the mourners.

The number of conveyances which composed the funeral procession to the cemetery was never exceeded at any funeral in Charlevoix. Mr. Smith, the Petoskey Funeral Director, officiated, and his systematic and thoughtful management was a subject of general comment.

Enos; instrumental solo, by Luna Washburn; a select reading by Miss Phila Wood; a vocal solo by Dr. Carlstein and the convesation led by H. Lee Iddings and Miss Cochran. The next meeting will be held at the residence of Dr. J. A. Carlstein. Paper to be read by Miss Carrie Hilton. Subject, "Mary and the Monarchy." The conversation will be led by Rob't Miller and Mrs. McCartney on "Tennyson's Queen Mary.

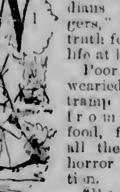
The Stolen Fortune

BY Abbie C. McKeever

CHAPTER XII.



WHEN Jim Gregory told Skete that Indians hated "niggers," he told the truth for once in his life at least.

Poor old Skete, wearied with his tramp and hungry from insufficient food, fully realized all the danger and horror of his position.

"Reckon dey'll burn me at de stake. Lor' don't I wish I done gone staid back dar in ole Virginny! But den I couldn't leah Massa Fairleigh an' dear Miss Nora, that is, 'less I done as ole Miss Grant—she runned away 'cause ob dese yer Indians. Golly! wonder what dey will do wid ole Skete?"

But he was rudely pushed into a tent where an old squaw was cooking a mess of herbs, and no further attention was paid to him.

The stars came out. Oh how brightly they twinkled among the white-capped mountains! There was only a mere patch of sky visible through the tent. The scene was altogether different from the level, far-reaching prairies that Skete had been accustomed to of late years.

"Wonder if dey will give dis yer darky any supper? Lor', but I be hungry! Done I wish I was back in de ole ranch helpin' Miss Nora cook. Golly, I'd fly round! But de ole ranch is gone, and Massa Fairleigh's gone, and by an' by ole Skete he'll be gone, too. I do wish 'fore de Lor' Miss Nora had dese yer papers, or I knowed some one as would take 'em to her. If I don't beholo here come my supper!"

Skete was right. The old squaw entered with a bowl of some kind of a mess and set it before him with a grunt, and to Skete the odd, dirty mixture was delicious.

While the braves were consulting together what was best to do with their black captive, whether to let him run the gauntlet or to burn him at the stake, and many other horrible measures, Skete settled it himself.

Perhaps it was the supper, perhaps the friendly stretch of the majestic mountains heavenward that recalled the old home in Virginia and the old plantation days and their songs, for as old memories crowded upon him Skete forgot the danger surrounding him, his cruel red foes, and began to sing, low at first, in a soft, crowing way, but louder and stronger until the old plantation songs and queer hymns rang out and echoed through the canyons.

The Indian, to whose ear the slightest sound is distinguishable, to the call of birds attuned, even the rustle of a leaf or the footfall of the panther conscious, could not fail to appreciate the natural sweetness and melody of Skete's voice.

Only a very few knew the meaning of the words, but every one, little and big, understood perfectly the music.

Skete had been the boss singer in the old plantation days, many a spell-bound audience he had held, but he never sang to so vast a crowd or so appreciating a crowd before.

The children and squaws first began to draw near, and then the braves.

Skete at last became conscious of his surroundings and his audience, and with a new indescribable hope in his heart, he fairly outdid himself.

At last, when all the old plantation songs had been sung, he took up the hymns his young mistress used to sing to her father, and when they were exhausted he began to whistle the waltzes and instrumental pieces she played on the piano.

But over they had an end, and Skete paused at last. A satisfied grunt or two was the only applause he received, but it was the best night's singing Skete ever did, for by it he was permitted to retain his woolly scalp and preserve a whole skin.

When the morning broke Skete opened his sleepy eyes, and, through the opening in the tent, beheld the blue skies and smiling landscape. How strange it all was; what funny sounds. Just then a young Indian boy thrust his head in the tent and regarded Skete's black face curiously.

"Got me any breakfast, my boy?" exclaimed Skete, smiling until he displayed his handsome white teeth.

But, from the blank face of the youth, he knew he was not understood.

Skete was a modern old Uncle Tom for trinkets and his liking for children, so he fished down deep in his pockets and drew forth a small whistle, on which he managed to play a tune, by chance selecting "Yankee Doodle."

The young Indian listened a moment in delight, and stretched forth his hand for the whistle.

"You go bring me some breakfast, honey, an I gib you dis whistle." And at the same time Skete began to work his jaws and make funny motions.

The eyes of the boy twinkled understandingly, and he disappeared to return in a short time with the old squaw who brought a piece of broiled meat well covered in ashes.

Skete at once placed the whistle in the boy's hand, and smiled on him so genially that they were from that minute ever after friends.

Thus it happened that Skete was permitted to become an inhabitant of their village, and in a few days wandered at will among them, doing many odd jobs, and making himself generally useful, and every night entertaining them with his songs.

The Indians evidently thought it impossible for him to return to his home, and that he would not attempt an escape.

Gradually he began to understand a few of their words and signs, and became more and more a friend by his many kindnesses.

Once, when a little child fell ill, Skete watched over it with tenderest care, and the mother really thought he saved its life.

Again, when a young lad fell into a deep and dangerous pond, striking his head against a rock, Skete sprang after him and fished him out.

But it was his songs and droll antics that were the true cause of their wonderful and unusual favor. If the noble red men didn't laugh over some of his funny dances and songs, they enjoyed them all the same, as any one could tell who watched their eyes twinkle.

But all this time Skete was thinking and wondering how he was ever to get away and go back over all those miles and miles that separated him from his loved mistress.

"Done reckon as I could find my way back ober all dem mountains. Golly, what a long ways dey did fetch me! 'Fore de Lor, I 'clare I dunno what eber will become ob Miss Nora. De ranch burned, massa gone, ole Skete gone, an'—an' dese yer papers gone! Redskins been pretty good to me, sure. La! didn't I jes expec dey would skin dis yar darkey alibe. Golly, I was in luck for once, sure. But I do wonder what dey would do wid me if I jes got on one ob dem yar ponies an'—an' rode off home. Better not try it yit a while, dough. Massa Fairleigh say nebber trust red man. Golly, what's dat rumpus ober now?"

Well might Skete ask himself that question; for such an uproar in the Indian camp he had never heard before. What it all meant he could not imagine, but he crept nearer the howling, wailing beings, and began to realize that there had been a fight, and that they were carrying home their dead. The wails of the widows rose above it all.

Skete trembled for his own safety, and crept back out of sight as much as possible.

"'Fore de Lor', but ain't dey hoppin' mad! Dis yar darky better keep close."

Preparations were at once begun to send out a large war party; every brave, excepting the very aged and very young, joined them. Skete expected to be compelled to be one among them, but was delighted to find himself entirely left out.

"Now's my time," he thought. "when all dem redskins git off; den I watch 'round an' watch 'round, steal out pony an' make dust fly toward Miss Nora an' de ole home. Dan, oh den I gib her dese yar papers, an' den we go back to ole Virginny, where Skete see de friends a many-many, an' dar Skete lib till he die."

The war party was some time getting off, and Skete was much alarmed until he saw the last of them disappear down the mountain trail.

He looked about him eagerly; the day had reached noon, the village had once more resumed its quiet, the herds were grazing in the valley, and among them was one pony that for a long time Skete had had an eye on.

A little chestnut fellow he was, strong and young, very swift and sure-footed. Skete was a good judge of a horse, and he felt that once mounted on that sturdy pony's back he would be almost sure of reaching home.

But how to get off? Ah! that was the question, and where was he to secure any arms? He needed a rifle and a revolver, because there were dangerous animals in the mountains who, no doubt, would make no difference whatever between a white man and a black one.

All the afternoon he skulked around, pretending to help at many trifling things, but in reality endeavoring to get hold of fire-arms.

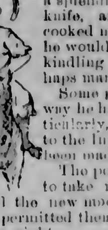
Only a few really good pieces had been left in the camp, but one of these, the rifle, was in the tent of an old invalid brave, but whose eyes were still sharp.

Skete was not discouraged, though, at the difficulties before him, and resolved to make the attempt. Just at nightfall, he crept around to where the rifle rested, and, by cutting a hole in the tent, managed to abstract it, along with the accouterments.

"I reckon I'll have to leab the revolver, 'cause I can't find none nowhere. Now, I'm must see about de pony; golly! if dey catch me, dey'll burn me sure, if dey don't shoot me fust."

But so carefully and cautiously he worked, he did succeed in getting off without arousing the least suspicion, and as night set in chill and dark, Skete struck out over the mountain trail bravely, going in what he supposed to be an easterly direction.

CHAPTER XIII.



SKETE had not started upon his long and perilous journey wholly unprepared. He possessed a splendid rifle, a keen knife, and a bag of cooked meat, for he knew he would not dare risk kindling a fire for perhaps many days.

Some points along the way he had noticed particularly, as his journey to the Indian village had been made on foot.

The pony, too, seemed to take naturally to the trail, and the new moon high in the heavens permitted them to continue it the entire night.

At break of day Skete prudently drew rein, and, finding a sheltered nook near a watercourse, he dismounted, and, tethering his pony securely, ate a slight breakfast, and as on that former occasion, crawled in under some bushes and went to sleep; but luckily for him no hostile Indians bivouacked near him, and no dangerous rattlesnake appeared upon the scene.

When he awoke he found his pony still quietly grazing, and the sun high in the heavens.

"What am best to do now, I wonder," mused Skete. "If I start again long ob de trail, I 'most certain sure to run ober some Indian. I guess I'll jes' stay right here till dark comes. I'd rather risk it by de moonlight."

And Skete, who liked to sleep much better than he did to work, quietly dozed off again.

When he awoke again his pony had eaten all the grass within his reach, and was regarding him with earnest, reproachful gaze.

"Golly, what a good sleep dat was! Yes, my fine fellow, you've eaten enough for present needs, and now it's 'bout time we was movin' on."

But before starting Skete cautiously crept from their sheltered vale and gazed down the trail as far as he could see. He was about to return to resume his journey when he fancied he saw an object moving very far down the path.

Seizing his rifle firmly, he secreted himself and awaited its approach.

It seemed a long time before it came near enough for Skete to know what it was, but at last, when he did realize what was actually before him, his heart seemed to stand still, and his knees could scarcely bear his weight.

"Golly, it's—it's a b'ar!"

Sure enough, it was a bear, and a very large and fierce-looking one at that.

"Golly! it's—it's a b'ar!"

Skete only clutched his rifle closer and crept back behind a tree, hoping that Bruin would pass him by without noticing him.

Just what might have taken place was hard to tell, for as Skete secreted himself he was astonished to hear the sharp report of a rifle below him, and to see the bear start and roll over as if shot.

Scarcely had the report died away than two Indians leaped forth, and with long knives soon finished the work the rifle had hardly done.

Skete beheld them dress the bear in most approved style, and trembled as he saw them making preparations to build a fire and cook a portion of it.

"'Fore de Lor' if I don't beliebe dey be goin' to git supper. Golly, now, if dat ar pony done keep still!"

Then Skete lowered himself to his hands and knees and began slowly to back himself out of the dangerous locality.

The Indians were so intent on their work they noticed nothing amiss, and in less than hour had departed, carrying a large portion of the bear's meat with them.

A nice bed of coals remained, and Skete crept out and, slicing off a few pieces from the portion remaining, broiled them and added them to his rapidly decreasing stock. Then he led his pony back to the trail, mounted it, and hastened from the spot.

Outspoken.

Mr. Bluntley was boasting in a crowd the other evening of his plainness of speech. He said, among other things, that he despised sham politeness, and that he honored the man who had sense and honesty enough to get along without it.

Mr. Smirker, who was one of the listeners, at once spoke up as follows:

"You're right, Mr. Bluntley; quite right. By the way, that reminds me. I am a little short to-day—you're not game enough, are you, Mr. Bluntley, to loan me five dollars until next week?"

Mr. Bluntley swelled up and turned purple with rage, while the crowd roared. Finally he found voice to say:

"Not by a blamed sight, sir!" And then he strode away, wearing an air of offended dignity.

He was Practicing.

"Aw say, Duke, deah boy," said the Marquis of Cameo to the Duc d'Orleans, "you shock me! Positively, yaw do, y' knaw."

"How so?"

"In sucking that beastly cider through a quill."

"Is that all, Cameo? Why, I am going to make a trip to America soon, and I'm practicing to drink sour things with a straw. I hear it's all the go on that side of the pond, and I don't want to be behind the times."

A CITIZEN of Davenport, Ia., whose garden is situated about 100 feet from an electric light tower, has remarked that his lilies close at sunset, but open again a few minutes after the arc lamps have been lighted. It has been observed at Detroit, too, that the foliage of the trees exposed to the rays of the electric light is much more luxuriant than that of such trees as are not.

The Soldier and the Robin.

BY ANNIE.

[Upon the cartridge-box of the soldier on guard in Spring Grove Cemetery, Cincinnati, Ohio, a robin built her nest under the overshadowing arm, which protected it from the weather.]

BENEATH the stately forest trees
In Spring Grove, passing fair,
Unconscious they sleep,
They rest in peace,
The band of heroes there.

Beside their graves, all grim and stern,
A bronze warrior stands;
With arms in port his gun is borne,
Prepared for all demands.

In war's habiliments arrayed,
A picket guard is he,
A living thing, he seems portrayed—
He seems to hear and see.

A long, thick overcoat he wears;
Protected well is he.
A lot of ammunition bears,
[illegible] armed cap-a-pie.

The summer's heat and winter's cold
Alike are scorned by him;
He guards the graves of heroes bold—
That brazen warrior grim.

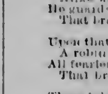
Upon that soldier's cartridge-box
A robin built her nest;
All fearless of the martial look
That brazen form possessed.

There laid her eggs secure from harm,
And reared her feathered brood,
Protected by the soldier's arm,
Which held his musket good.

So liberty and peace are gained
Beneath the sword of war;
And by the sword alone maintained
Those priceless jewels are.

The Gas Man at Ford's Theater.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.



THE cut is a representation of one of the general admission tickets to Ford's Theater, Washington, for the performance of "Our American Cousin" on the night when President Lincoln was assassinated by John Wilkes Booth, the actor. This one was taken at the door that evening, and was presented, with some others, by the Treasurer of the New Ford's Theater, from whom it was obtained. Very few of these souvenirs of that tragic and sorrowful event are now in existence. In connection with the sketch that follows, which relates a startling phase of the conspiracy not generally known, it is a most interesting memento.

There were many persons engaged in that conspiracy who were never discovered. Some have died, others are doubtless alive to-day, but wisely keep their mouths closed as to their knowledge of the hideous plot. A few years ago one of these made a startling revelation upon his death-bed. It showed that the conspiracy, as first carefully planned, was defeated at the last moment by a mere trifle, and that, had the details of the first plot been carried out, the assassin could not have been known. This sounds strange now, but it is perfectly true. The story comes from actors, some of them well known in the theatrical world, but who do not wish their names mentioned. They knew the man who made the confession, himself an employe behind the scenes at Ford's, and they have never doubted that he told the truth in his last moments.

The man referred to was the gas man of the theater. Such a person is an important factor behind the scenes. He has sole charge of the apparatus, and at the signal of the stage-manager lowers and raises the lights, turns off and lights up the gas, etc. All this is done now-a-days by merely touching different electric buttons; but at Ford's the clumsy system of that day was in use. Turn-cocks were attached to the pipes in a chest set well back on the stage, out of sight. The gas man kept the key, and he alone had access to the chest.

It is a mistake to regard Booth as a desperado, bent on executing his devilish scheme even at the sacrifice of his own life. The public manner of the assassination, and his leap to the stage in full view of two thousand people, was an afterthought, adopted on the pressure of the moment, when his own carefully matured scheme had been defeated. Much as he wanted to kill the President, he never wanted to be known as the assassin, and had his plan not miscarried, he never would have been known in that character, save perhaps, to a select circle of admiring Secessionists in Baltimore, Washington, Richmond, Charleston and New Orleans, who could have been safely trusted with the dreadful secret.

His plan was simple, and its very simplicity seemed to insure its success. The President's party having been seated in their box, at a given signal the gas was to be turned off, leaving the whole house in darkness. Booth, having marked the exact position of his victim at the instant, and having access to the box, would promptly do the murder in the dark. So great would be the confusion and uproar in the immense audience that packed the house, over the mere fact of total darkness, that the horrible tragedy just secretly and successfully accomplished could not be made known for some time so that it would be understood. The gas man would have locked the chest and quietly departed with the key in his pocket, probably en route for Canada; it might be half an hour before the house could be relighted. In the meantime the commission of the crime had been perfectly hidden by the darkness. It would not be a question in the case of the escape of the assassin; for although Booth had taken the precaution to have a saddle-horse ready in the alley outside, he deemed it a mere precaution. There would be no proof, nothing more than suspicion against him if his plot succeeded.

The signal for the turning off of the gas was thought to be the master-stroke of the plot. None but a man with a strong dramatic instinct could have chosen it.

Let the reader recall the time. The fall of Richmond and Petersburg and the pursuit and surrender of Lee had followed in quick succession, occurring but a few days before. The North was in a transport of joy; Washington was full of soldiers; a thousand of them would be at Ford's Theater that night, as it was known that the President would attend. The manager saw that something besides the rather tame play of "Our American Cousin" must be presented to satisfy the patriotic overflowing of men's hearts. So it was made part of the programme that, when the President's party was seated, several male quartettes should take the stage, and sing the national anthem, "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," the house naturally joining in. A designated line of this anthem was to furnish the signal to the gas man. With the last short line of the first stanza, the whole theater was to be plunged in darkness, and the murder would swiftly follow.

"Let freedom ring!"

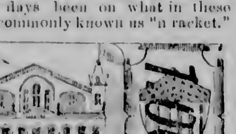
Down to a time possibly not more than one minute preceding the singing of the fatal line, events seemed to march straight on to the consummation of the tragedy exactly as planned. The overture was done; the President, Mrs. Lincoln, Major Rathbone and Miss Harris and arrived and were seated, amid the plaudits of the house; the singing of "America" from the stage had commenced. Booth stood at the box-door, one hand on the knob, the other on his pistol; the gas man behind the scenes went to his chest. And then

It was the great Talleyrand, I believe, who said that "from the sublime to the ridiculous is but a step." The truth of the saying was never proved as it was in that moment!

An actor of the company had for several days been on what in these days is commonly known as "a racket."

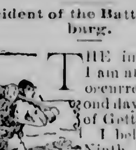


He was lingering about the wings on this evening in a boozy condition, when the manager caught sight of him and proceeded to give him "a wigging." To do so more at ease, he plumped the delinquent down on the gas-chest and took a seat beside him. The gas man came up, and saw at once that the "cue" could not be given. He did not dare to draw attention to his proceedings by requesting the manager to move. To be watched was to insure him the scaffold!

The anthem went on; "Let freedom ring" was sonorously rolled through the house; the lights were undimmed; the piece was finished with wild applause; the play was begun.

And there in the lobby was Booth, raging with disappointment, striding up and down, now seen by half a dozen different persons, nerving his hand and his brain for the public assassination that occurred an hour later.

An Incident of the Battle of Gettysburg.



THE incident which I am about to relate occurred on the second day of the battle of Gettysburg.

I belonged to the Ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Volunteers, and in the same company with me were William W. Jeffery, Isaac N. McMunn (afterward Captain), M. Copeland, J. Porter and J. Rigdon. I mention this as they were connected with the affair which I am about to relate.

We were lying behind a stone wall and the firing had almost ceased on our part of the line. There was a lull in the battle at this point, although it was raging furiously both to the right and left. In front of our lines a great many rebel wounded were lying, calling for help and begging piteously for water. The Colonel of our regiment rode along and asked who would volunteer to go out and give aid to the wounded. A dozen men, or more, instantly consented to go, the men named above being of the number. The rebels were within speaking distance, and they were asked if our men would be unmolested if they should go out and bring in or give water to the suffering Confederates. They agreed that the Union soldiers would certainly be unmolested if our men would take care of their wounded. The party immediately started out and one man had been carried in behind the stone wall. Another wounded Confederate was being lifted from the ground when a volley was opened on the humane Union soldiers, and I. N. McMunn was shot through the head, the bullet carrying away his upper jaw. The Confederate wounded were instantly dropped, and two of McMunn's comrades seized him and hurried him off the field. Another soldier, William W. Jeffery, had raised a wounded Confederate and was giving him a drink from his canteen when the volley came. Of course the poor Confederate wounded man got no more water from the Union soldier, for he speedily made his way, with his comrades, to a place of safety.

The Confederates numbered many honorable men in their ranks, but the affair above related is considered one of the most despicable on record, and some Union soldiers are loath to believe the truth of it. Mr. McMunn, after a great deal of suffering, recovered, and, with the aid of an artificial roof in his mouth, he speaks almost as well as he did before he received his wound. He is now a prominent man in the city of Pittsburg.

War-Time Envelopes.

A CORRESPONDENT a short time ago referred to the pictures, emblems and songs printed on envelopes and letter-paper during the war.

This is a subject which, if followed up, will develop much that is curious and interesting.

I have in my possession an envelope with a unique picture in the upper left-hand corner. In the distance a few scattered Confederates are flying before a solid mass of Unionists, while in the foreground is a donkey very much alarmed at sight of a lion. An officer stands at one side apparently suffering from colic. Above the picture is the word "Strayed," and below it is the following:

"From the neighborhood of Boonville, Mo., an ugly Jack, who was frightened by the sudden appearance of a Lion, his jockey, one Price, being made very sick by the same appearance. He is of no value whatever, and only a low Price can be given for his capture. SAM."

This has reference to the defeat of Gov. Jackson at Boonville, Mo., June 17, 1861, by Gen. Lyon; the Price alluded to being the Confederate general of that name.

Another envelope has the picture of a bell with the word "Liberty" upon it; and beneath, "Proclaim liberty throughout the land unto all the inhabitants thereof."

Another has an eagle upon a banner, and the inscription, "Our Country, Now and Forever."

A song in three stanzas occupies nearly one half of one envelope. The following is a copy:

THE DYING SOLDIER.

The fight was over, the bloody day was gloriously won,
And thick, dark clouds of battle-smoke shut out the setting sun;
The awful tumult of the strife, the cannon's deadly roar,
The vengeful shouts of maddened men, convulsed the air no more.
Stretched on a bed of blood-stained flowers, a dying soldier lay,
Clasping the pictured image of a [illegible] one far away,
The dews of Heaven were on his cheek, his lips were cold and pale,
And none but weeping angels came to hear his dying wail.
All pain forgot, his thoughts went back to his dear native bowers,
And dreaming fancy woke again young love's delicious hours;
And memory wreathed his lips with smiles as life's last tie was riven,
And, blessing her he fondly loved, his soul went home to Heaven.

Useless Slaughter Averted.

A G. FEATHER writes in the Philadelphia Times:

The position of the army in front of Mine Run was a commanding one, and would have proven advantageous had the Confederates seen proper to take the offensive. But this was hardly to be expected, since they were too well intrenched, and, moreover, the lateness of the season did not warrant such a step. Meade, on the contrary, feeling that it was necessary he should make some demonstration against the enemy, in order to satisfy the ruling authorities at Washington, determined on an assault at a point where he thought the enemy's line was weakest. He ordered the assault to be made by the Fifth Corps, under Gen. Warren, supported by the Third Division of the Third Corps. This division was sent from the extreme right to the rear of Warren's Corps on the left, and in close columns. It was about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and the assaulting columns were in line, awaiting the order to advance. None but a soldier, or one "who has been there himself," can fully realize the pleasant reflections which overshadow the mind under such circumstances. Time passed and the order to advance came not. Three o'clock came, and yet no word. Four o'clock approached, and with it came General Meade and his staff. The General alighted from his horse and walked over to a tree under which were resting General French and his staff. It was now that anxiety gave way to nervousness, as it was expected that with Meade's arrival upon the scene would come the order to advance. The consultation between the two Generals was closely watched by thousands of anxious hearts. It lasted fully a half hour, when the order was sent out countermanding the previous order, and the Third Division was directed to return to its own corps.

The writer has it from a staff officer who was present at the time that Meade, on asking General French what his opinion was as to the results of an assault, received for reply:

"You will have twenty thousand men less in the Army of the Potomac to-morrow."

"So bad as that, General?" rejoined Meade.

"Yes, the slaughter will simply be terrible to successfully carry the position, and can you afford such a sacrifice at this time?" queried French.

To this Meade replied, after some apparent meditation: "No; and if successful I do not think we could afford the cost. The advantages to be derived would hardly compensate us." And with this he withdrew, mounted his horse and galloped away.

Captured the Mules.

WHEN the Union troops first received their teams in Kentucky, some difficulty was experienced in procuring feed, and the mules were on that account turned out to forage. From time to time they strayed off or were stolen by the horse dealers. There were at one time about thirty of the Federal mules at Blandville. Two privates of the Fourteenth Illinois, hearing of the mules, sought permission of General Smith to go and bring them in, which request, after some hesitation, General Smith granted.

The two boys clothed themselves in the garb of Kentucky farmers, and, with a supply of old Bourbon whisky, they started for Blandville. They soon found the mules, and first proceeded to get the parties having charge of them gloriously drunk. They then went to the corral, let down the fence, selected each a good mule, which they mounted, without saddle or bridle, and started for camp. As the two mules started off at a rapid rate the whole drove followed, setting up a braying that awoke the echoes from the surrounding hills. Soon pursuit was given, but for fear of the Federal troops the parties did not go very far before returning. The boys soon arrived at the camp with the whole herd, making more racket than a regiment of cavalry. When they reported at headquarters General Smith said:

"Well, boys, what luck?"

"Got our mules," said the boys, "and more than we lost."

"Ah!" said the General, "how many have you got?"

"Well, about forty, I reckon," replied one of the boys.

"But that is more than we lost," said General Smith. "You didn't steal any, I hope?"

"Steal any? No, sir-ee; but the blamed things would follow us, and as we had no bridles we could not stop to drive them back."

The General turned from the subject of the mules and began to lecture the boys on the practice of swearing in the presence of the officers.

"Excuse us, General," said the leader, "but, you see, we had to cuss the darned mules all day, and it is hard to break off all of a sudden."

Why, my dear sir, we care nothing for such feeble support. But tell me, is their a native American vote?"—Arkansaw Traveler.

Novel Uses for Gravestones.

Nothing goes on in an uninterrupted career in this world, and even gravestones come now and then and to strange uses. In a village in Maine, for instance, a farmer, having waxed in fortune until he was able to replace the slate gravestones in his family burial lot by marble, was too thrifty to throw the old slabs away. He therefore utilized them as door stones, so that all visitors to the kitchen and the diary trod upon inscriptions gradually fading away, which, with scriptural phrase and the cheerful overseeing of triangular-visaged cherubs, recorded the names, the virtues, and the untimely taking off of the forefathers of the thrifty farmer.

In another Maine village is, or was, a boarding school for young ladies, in the kitchen of which a large white marble slab, sacred to the memory of a worthy woman, whom it described as having died in the Lord, was used as a kneading board. Now and then a loaf of bread after it was moulded would rest for a moment or two on the deeply cut inscription, and the pupils averred—how truthfully the editor makes no pretense of being able to determine—that they had been able to decipher bits of the words printed on the bottom of the slices of bread.

But perhaps the most remarkable fate for a tombstone was that which befell the moss-grown slab in an English churchyard. An American parvenu of the same family name as that of the man whose death the stone recorded purchased the stone of a dishonest sexton and brought it home with her. It is now set into the wall of her sumptuously appointed New York library, besides a fictitious pedigree, which lies to all beholders by tracing the family of the present owner back to that of the man whose name is on the stone. As he has been dead 170 years he is probably beyond caring for such things, else Mrs. Parvenu might have good reason to expect a call from his ghost some night, come to reclaim his gravestone.—Boston Courier.

Smooth as Silk.

"I should think," said Ethel, "it would feel so funny to have a mustache on your lip. Doesn't it tickle you all the time?" "No," said Æthelred, boldly, "it does not feel strange at all. See—" And just then the brooding owl that to the moon complained from yonder mantled tower was scared out of a year's hooting by a startling sound, like the final exhaust of a bath tub at midnight's silent hour, only louder and more abrupt. "Oh!" said Ethel, in a sweet little voice, and "Ah," said Æthelred, with the satisfied tone of a man who has just swallowed a large, wide, long, brand new oyster.—Burdette.

Oh, Wise Young Judge!

Little Mabel, 5 years old, is not so young but that she has picked up some knowledge of the world. She said to her mother the other day, after a fit of deep musing:

"Say, mamma, who was papa before he married us, anyway?"

"Who was papa? Why, he was the same man that he is now."

"Yes; but what was he to you? Was he just a man that you mashed?"—Alton (Ill.) Democrat.

Capt. Coleman, schr. Weymouth, plying between Atlantic City and N. Y., had been troubled with a cough so that he was unable to sleep, and was induced to try Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption. It not only gave him instant relief, but allayed the extreme soreness in his breast. His children were similarly affected and a single dose had the same happy effect. Dr. King's New Discovery is now the standard remedy in the Coleman household and on board the schooner. Free Trial Bottles of this Standard Remedy at Dr. G. W. Crouter's Drug Store.

A Knowing Dog.

Mr. T. M. Macdonald, secretary to the King's College Hospital, London, tells the following story of a dog's sagacity: [illegible] As soon as the porter came out the two terriers left the collie with him and ran off. [illegible]

On examination it was found that the dog had an artery cut on his right fore-leg, with a three-inch wound. The leg was dressed and bandaged and the hemorrhage arrested, and the dog lay outside the hospital on the grass for a couple of hours, and then went away. [illegible] and secured his admission as an outpatient.

They Paid for Their Little Joke.

A story comes from Weldon, N. C., to the Wilmington Star, about a well-known engineer on the Atlantic Coast Line who is said to be a little superstitious. He feels sad if he fails to look at the new moon over his right shoulder, and always makes a cross mark in his path when he has to turn back for something that he has forgotten. It is said that he will travel a mile out of his way to avoid a graveyard, and carries the left hind foot of a rabbit in his pistol pocket. [illegible]

Having Fun With the Birds.

A novel sight greeted the eyes of a reporter who was strolling about Irvington-on-the-Hudson a few days ago, says the New York [illegible]. [illegible]

"Does she pull, bub?" asked the stroller.

"Not very much, but just enough to have fun with the birds," was the reply.

"Fun with the birds; what do you mean?"

"Why, can't you see the birds? Just watch for a minute and you'll see what I mean."

The kite was sailing gracefully aloft, waving her long tail as though proud of her high position in the world. Skimming through the air, round about the kite and along the string, were a large number of swallows. After a while one of the birds lit on the string about half way between the boy's hand and the kite; then another and another alighted in the same manner that birds are wont to line telegraph wires. As the gathering weight increased with each additional bird the string drooped until it almost touched the tops of the cornstalks in a neighboring field, and it looked as if the kite itself would be borne to the ground. Then the boy gave the string a sudden jerk, and the startled swallows scurried off in what seemed to be a mad game of tag, and the string, released of its feathered burden, once more became taut and the kite rose to its former high position. Soon, however, the birds returned to the string and again almost bore the kite to the ground.

"Do the swallows always light on a kite string that way?" asked the reporter.

"Yes, whenever I let 'em. I like to play with them. It's great fun."

"Let me hold the string a minute?" said the stroller, and as he found himself flying a kite once more his thoughts went back to his own boyhood days, the days when he had played with the birds in that same way. Again and again the little feathered tramps alighted along the string, only to be dislodged by the sudden jerk of the kite-flyer's hand. The birds really seemed to enjoy the fun.

A Poor Policy.

The local agent of a fire company went out to Crane street one day recently to adjust a loss in a dwelling-house. An Eastern firm got hold of a new drummer who was very highly recommended by some friends of theirs. They gave him a case of samples and $300 and sent him off. His answer was brief and worthy of his profession, it was: "Send me another $500. I'm still with you."—San Francisco Chronicle.

The other day in a crowded street-car a gentleman gave his seat to an aged lady. He was rewarded with a smile, and when she got out she gave him another smile and a tract which began: "Young man, do you know desus?" This was amiable weakness on the part of an aged lady, but it is curious that she failed to give tracts to the good Christians who retained their seats and thought only of the tired out Jewish clerk who sprang up with alacrity at her entrance.—Jewish Messenger.

About Kisses.

Nothing is more dainty than the kiss of a well-bred woman, who, mindful of the time and trouble spent over the powder-box, gently presses her lips on your [illegible] just south of your ear. The minister's wife is another [illegible] who knows where a kiss will do the least harm, and see [illegible] is an air kiss, with a gentle pressure of her cheek to your cheek. The woman of fashion kisses you anywhere about the triangle between the eye, ear and hair line. She has learned long ago about the incompatibility of kisses and grace, and as she advances you see her lips turn in, and simultaneously with the kiss is a thick, vicious noise that sounds like the tearing of a wet, ill-shaped marshmallow drop. Married women are more addicted to kissing than single ones, and they are the very kisses that a young woman least enjoys, for the reason that their lips are always wet. Kissing the face of an irregularly powdered, soapy smelling dame is about as unsavory a pastime as gathering a bouquet of dandelions.

The "American Hog."

It was in a car on a Third avenue elevated train a few days ago. All the seats were filled by gentlemen going up town. Suddenly a woman's voice at the door rang out:

"Move up, you American hogs, and let ladies in."

Everybody looked to the door. In came a gorgeously-dressed woman, with a nose like a snow-plow on a western railroad and a bustle nearly as large as a bale of cotton. She led a little girl by the hand, and behind them came a well-behaved elderly lady.

"Mabel," said the woman, addressing the girl, "I don't think any of these hogs will give you a seat. Come up here; it smells bad back there."

Then the woman moved forward and stood in front of a seat occupied by four gentlemen, one of whom wore a cork leg and the badge of the old Twelfth Corps. No one arose to give the party a seat. The "American hogs" remained absorbed in their papers. The woman talked loudly to the elderly lady of a reception she was to give the next evening, and wanted her to attend. At Forty-seventh street she went out, remarking, "Don't fail to come to my drawing-room to-morrow. I shall expect you. Good-by. I hope some foreign gentleman will give you a seat before you reach Harlem."

When the woman had disappeared the old Twelfth Corps veteran dressed his cork leg, arose, and, giving his seat to the elderly lady, said:

"Excuse me, madam. You are evidently a lady, and you would have had this seat long ago did I not fear that your companion would fall into it if I arose. You are going to her reception to-morrow evening. Here is my card. Please assure her that an American hog has seated you, and that, had she conducted herself as a lady, some other hog would probably have seated her. Your companion is not a lady, and she has a husband, and she will send him to my office in the Potter Building, I will tell him so."

The words were uttered in such a low tone that few heard it, but the old lady took the card without remark and placed it in her portemonnaie.—New York Telegram.

Birds That Know Something.

An exhibition of educated parrots recently held in Paris showed very clearly to what a high state of perfection these birds are capable of being trained. Their stage was a long table, at one end of which were perches, on which were grouped half a dozen parrots. Four of these were cockatoos—white, with yellow crests; the other two were gray parrots, with the neck and under parts rose color.

Among the tricks which they perform at the bidding of their owner, M. Abdy, are the following: Two fixed spars on upright supports are placed on the table; a parrot climbs upon one of them, turns a somersault, keeps his head downward, and passing on to the second bar goes through the same exercise. Their owner then calls Tom, a small white parrot, who comes toward him as if about to climb on one of the bars, but runs back again, holding down his head and shaking his wings in a grotesque way. Tom is evidently the buffoon of the troupe. A bell is then brought with a handle which forms a lever, a parrot advances, and putting one foot on the lever rings the bell. The trainer asks the audience want number of rings they wish for; some one exclaims "seven!" and the parrot rings the bell seven times.

The bird is then asked how much does three times three make and it replies by ringing the bell nine times. A perch is then placed on the table in the form of a see-saw, at each end of which a gray parrot perches, and in the center, just above the pivot, jumps a magnificent white parrot named Charley, the principal one in the troupe. This parrot, throwing the weight of his body successively to right and left of the pivot, rocks the see-saw rapidly. To see the animation of the bird during the performance one would suppose that he took a real pleasure in rocking his companions.

The same bird then goes through another exercise. Four flagstaffs are set up on the table, and at the foot of each is a flag attached to a cord which passes over a pulley at the top. The flags are English, French, Belgian and American. One of the audience asks for the French flag. Charley advances, draws himself up, erecting his bright yellow crest, and, spreading his wings, suddenly seizes the line with his beak, and then, alternately with beak and foot, hauls up the flag as a sailor would—hand over hand—until it is fast at the top. He then goes through the same performance with the other flags in succession.

Several letters of the alphabet are placed upright upon the table, and Charley is again brought forward, pluming himself as before. A spectator calls for a letter. Charley hesitates, inclines his head on one side, appears to reflect, then suddenly advances and picks up the letter named, repeating the performance with other letters when called for. Suddenly little Tom jumps off his perch, runs up, seizes the remaining letters one after another, and pitches them away on the floor. Another parrot then appears and at the word of command throws several somersaults on the table. Two others follow, and waltz slowly round while the music plays.

Of all parrots M. Abdy considers the white cockatoos the most gifted in regard to agility and capability for learning tricks—being, in fact, acrobats by nature. They are very slow in learning to talk, but they are easily taught and understand and do what they are told.—From Da Nature.

THE DISASTROUS BLIZZARD.

Reasons for the Extraordinary Fatality of the Storm—A Deceptive Lull.

Remarkable Individual Experiences—How to Save One's Life in a Blizzard.

[Sioux Falls (Dakota) letter.]

The great blizzard of Thursday, Jan. 12, will long be remembered. In fact, the day will go down into history as the date of a most extraordinary event.

That fifty or one hundred persons more or less should have been frozen to death is truly a terrible calamity. And yet Dakota ought not to be condemned and shunned by home-seekers because of this heartrending occurrence. The truth is, the blizzard of Thursday was absolutely the worst ever known in central and southern Dakota.

It was a peculiar blizzard. Generally the Dakota storms, whether in winter or summer, last for at least a part of three days. But this baneful blizzard seemed to cut itself in two. It began on Wednesday and proved to be a very severe storm, with fresh snow, which the wind took up with great force and whirled with bewildering effect. By Thursday morning the snow ceased falling, the wind died down, and people began congratulating themselves on a comparatively easy escape from what ...

Although the toboggan slides of the Northeast and Northwest are groaning under the weight of thousands of merry coasters; although the snow-covered boulevards of our great cities throughout the North are thronged with sleighloads of merry people, whose laughter mingles with the joyous jingle of the bells, and notwithstanding that the eyes of every lover of winter festivities in no less than a dozen of the most populous States of the Union are turned toward St. Paul in anticipation of the coming carnival of the Ice King and his subjects in that city, the columns of the great daily papers of the country are beginning to fill up with gossip—speculative and newsy—as to the probabilities of the coming season in connection with the great national game of the Americans—base-ball. Bills authorizing the construction of bridges at Lexington, Mo., and Burlington, Iowa, were reported to the Senate and placed on the calendar. The Senate adopted Mr. Manderson's resolution calling on the Secretary of War for information regarding the construction of a bridge at Omaha. The Senate spent most of the day in secret session at work on its calendar of treaties. Those of chief consequence are the British, Russian, and Dutch extradition treaties. It is understood that the treaty with the Netherlands was ratified. ROBERT TOOMBS.

Some Reminiscences of One of the Leaders of the Confederacy.

The first evidence of the coming power of this remarkable man, says a writer in the Courier-Journal, was exhibited at Willington, a small village in Abbeville District (as the present counties were then called), South Carolina. Gen. George McDuffie, the only representative of Demosthenes in this country since Patrick Henry, lived near there. McDuffie was harnessed lightning. He forged the chain of logic at a white heat. He was the most nervous, impassioned, and thrilling tribune of the people of that day. He demonstrated the political problems as Euclid did geometry, while foaming at the mouth and screaming like a painted Creek Indian. He had married the only daughter of Dick Singleton, the celebrated millionaire turfman and rice planter, and he owned 400 slaves and made 800 bales of cotton a year. He had been a member of Congress, Governor of South Carolina, and was afterward United States Senator. The people, before making up their minds on any political question would say: "Mr. McDuffie is going to speak at Murrow's old field two weeks from now, and I will wait till I hear him;" and there they would come forty and fifty ...

No Place Like Home.

That a man's house is his castle is an old and very much battered tradition supposed to be a common law. But the due and full understanding of the precept is not common. It is not always from foes or disturbances without that the castle needs defense, for the inner furnishing and comfort also require to be diligently looked after. When this is done, for "castle" we substitute the word "home." And the home should be in the highest sense the "castle," for man, woman, and child. That good old household word comes to us from the Saxon and the relative languages; and there is no room for doubt that it is a power among all peoples in whose languages the world is at home. An old English poet ...

PRESERVING DEAD HEROES!

How This Was Done by the People of Alaska and Ethiopia.

[Philadelphia Record.]

In Alaska up to comparatively modern times the dead have been mummified. Mr. W. H. Dall in his recent work on the Northwest coast, tells us that within the last half century bodies have been eviscerated, cleansed from fatty matters in running waters, dried and placed in cases, wrapped in fur and woven grasses. The body was usually doubled up into the smallest compass, and the mummy-case suspended, so as not to touch the ground, in some convenient rock shelter. Sometimes, however, the prepared body was placed in a life-like position, dressed and armed. Some were made to look as if engaged in a congenial occupation, such as hunting, fishing, sewing, etc. With them were also placed effigies of the animals they were pursuing, while the hunter was decked in his wooden armor and provided with an enormous mask, all ornamented with leather and a countless variety of wooden pendants, colored in gay patterns. All the Alaskan mummies wear masks, so arranged that the wearer, if erect, could only see the ground at his feet. These were also worn at their religious dances, from the belief that the spirit which was sup...

LENGTH OF DAYS.

Five Hundred Years Old—Is Living a Lost Art?

Is life worth living?

In the days of long ago people seemed to think it was, if the length of time they devoted to becoming acquainted with its lights and shadows is any criterion.

It would seem as though life must have afforded much of enjoyment in the good old days. Sophocles hung on until he was 130 years old, then perished by an accident. Attila was 124 when he died of the consequence of a revel on the night of his second marriage. This is a warning to young men. Epimenides was 157 at his regretted decease.

Crowns did not sit so heavily on the brows of monarchs as they seem latterly to do. Fohi, the founder of the Chinese Empire, reigned 115 years, and so did Apaphus of Thebes, Egyptian. Tacitus gives 175 years to Tuisco, a German prince. Dandon, an Illyrian noble, lived for 500 years, according to Alexander Cornelius.

The art of living seems to be one of the many "lost arts," which the dark ages covered over, and modern civilization has not yet been able to uncover. It is certain long life was not secured by using mineral poisons as remedies for disease. That is essentially modern practice. The ancients doubtless drew on the laboratory of nature for their medicines, hence the span of their lives was naturally extended.

We know that our immediate ancestors found their medicines in the fields and forests, adjoining their log cabin homes. These natural remedies were efficacious and harmless—left no poison in the system. Physicians were rarely called in, and the people lived to rugged and hearty old age. Is it not worth while to return to their wholesome methods ...

New Albany Public Press (dem): There are altogether too many democratic sycophants and toadies who believe Cleveland is the democratic party, but there are not enough to re-elect him.

They think in London that Henry M. Stanley is either dead or lost in the jungles of Africa. Henry will turn up at the proper time—he always does—and London manages to keep him pretty well advertised.

"The dogs of war" in Europe just now seem to lack "the sinews of war." It is particularly fortunate that their treasuries are not like that of the United States, filled to fullness with a "great surplus."

Rev. Sam Jones has a rough time of it among the cow-boy citizens of Kansas City. The hall in which he preached was entered by roughs, who strapped the janitor to a bench, smashed the piano and organ, burned up the the books, and saturated the furniture with kerosene. Sam, however, proceeded with his work, and he now says that Kansas City is nearer hell than any town he ever visited.

Detroit Tribune: Congressman Cutcheon has given the democrats an opportunity to show their tariff hand and challenges them to do so. He has offered resolutions declaring among other things that in all adjustments to tariff duties the principle of protection should be distinctly recognized and firmly adhered to. That is striking the key-note exactly. The resolutions were referred to the ways and means committee where a democratic dispatch predicts they will rest. All right. If the democrats are too cowardly to consider them they will probably "rest." But what an interesting sight to see the democrats retreating under the very first firing of the protection gun.

Salt, at wholesale in Saginaw, is 60 cents per barrel. The barrel costs 20 cents, which leaves five bushels, or 280 pounds of salt for 40 cents, or 8 cents a bushel. At seven and a half barrels, 2,100 pounds to a ton, this is $3 per ton—all packed in barrels. At Liverpool the price in bulk is $2.75 per ton. The duty is $1.60 per ton, in bulk. By the free trade assertion our "salt monopolists" add this to the price of their salt, and so rob the people. If so, salt in Saginaw should sell at $4.35 per ton, or 76 cents per barrel, with barrel counted in. But it is only 60 cents, the assertion being refuted by this fact, and salt as cheap in Saginaw as in Liverpool. In barrels, or other packages, the duty is 12 cents per 100 pounds, or $2.40 per ton, so that really, if the tariff on salt in packages is added to its price, by on salt, even, it should sell in Saginaw at 94 cents instead of 60 cents per barrel.

In the death of Mitchel Englemen of Manistee, that city mourns the loss of an able man, one of its most enterprising and wealthy citizen. The deceased was a Bavarian by birth, and went to Manistee in 1853 when 21 years of age, and a poor boy, the son of poor parents. Soon afterwards he in company with his brother Nathan commenced operating a small saw mill. They gradually bought up tracts of land, built other mills, established a lumber mill at Milwaukee, and accumulated wealth. They also went into the steamboat business, operating what was known as the Engelmann Transportation Company, between Grand Haven and Milwaukee, and also between Manistee and Milwaukee. Among their passenger steamers which operated on these lines were the Manistee, Messenger, Lac La Belle and Ironsides. The steamboat business was managed by Nathan Engelmann at Milwaukee, and after his death the deceased sold out his entire interest at Milwaukee to Cushman, Calkins & Co., with the exception of some real estate, and removing to Milwaukee, assumed the management of the boats. In his management of the steamboat business he met with several heavy losses and was not especially successful, and merging that interest with those of the Northern Transportation Company, he returned to Manistee and bought back his lumber interests, which business he has successfully carried on ever since. His principal plant, which is situated on the north side of the Manistee river, was recently merged into the Manistee Salt and Lumber Company. He was also interested in the firm of S. Babcock & Co., manufacturers of shingles and hoops, and in the lumber firm of Engelmann & Kitzinger. Besides these interests, Mr. Engelmann was vice President of the Manistee National Bank, owner of the finest block in the city, and other real estate property, and was worth about $1,000,000.

Northern Michigan against California twelve months in the year.

Not a white person died at Harbor Springs between April 14th, 1887, and Jan 16, 1887

Work in the lumber woods in Northern Michigan is said to be nearly at a standstill. Too much snow.

Hon. H. W. Seymour was in Rome, Italy, when he received news of his nomination in the 11th congressional district.

It cost the upper peninsula iron companies $10,000,000 in freight to get $40,000,000 worth of iron to market last year.

A notable sight recently at East Jordan was a big dog plodding along in a blinding snow-storm with a small boy on his back.

Trouble is expected at St. Ignace over the order of the Marshal to saloonkeepers to obey the liquor law by closing their places between 9 p. m., and 7 a. m., and removing all screens.

It is reported that J. C. Brown, of East Saginaw, will construct a log railroad from Rogers City through to Indian River next summer, making connections with the Michigan Central at the latter place.

James Buckley, for years engaged in the hardware business in Petoskey, has sold out and is going south on a prospecting tour, with the possibility of locating somewhere down there. Failing health is the cause.

The Petoskey Business Men banquetted at the Cushman House one night last week, and a great time is reported. Charlevoix set the example in this banquet business, and now we suppose they will all have a "big eataway."

Harbor Springs Republican: Mr H. H. Chipman, of Petoskey, allowed us to sample a few apples the other day which were raised on his old farm, near Reading. Mr. C. has been ailing for some time, and is now being treated by Dr. Cannon.

The business men of Boyne City, with their families, gathered at Lewis' Hall Wednesday evening of last week for their first annual banquet. Members from Boyne Falls and Advance were present, and in all about 50 people sat down to supper.

Grand Traverse Herald: W. S. Johnson, of Sutton's Bay, received 40 good straight democratic votes at the democratic congressional convention at Marquette. But the convention was not looking for a democrat just then, and so they dropped him. And that's where they missed it.

Chas. D. Crandall, postmaster at Big Rapids, was arrested at Grand Rapids one day last week, by federal authorities, because of alleged crookedness in his record and returns. It is further alleged that he was realizing $150 from box rents which the government was entitled to, and also using postal money in his private affairs.

Bellaire Breeze: Lillie, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. F. E. Woolsey, died at ten a. m. Thursday. She had been a great sufferer for about ten days, some of her symptoms being similar to those present in hydrophobia. Lillie was about ten years of age, a bright, intelligent little girl, and sincere sympathy from many friends goes out to the afflicted parents.

Mr. M. C. Hoffman, supervisor of Liberty Township, Wexford county, was struck by a passenger train near Manton, recently. His horses were killed, his cutter ruined, and himself so badly injured that his recovery is probably impossible. His head was cut in several places, apparently to the brain. He is one of the leading men of the county, and has a wife and one small child.

At St. Ignace, fire caught in the Duluth, South Shore & Atlantic railway depot, from a peanut stand, one day recently. Had it not been for a stream of water from the steamer Algomah, all the road's warehouses would have been destroyed. The city fire engine broke down. Nothing but a shell remains of the depot. The St. Ignace fire engine is the same one that was rejected by Charlevoix as no good.

Petoskey Record: The committee appointed to solicit stock for the gas well started out Thursday morning, and in a couple of hours succeeded in disposing of several hundred dollars worth of shares. The business men seem only too anxious to have an opportunity to subscribe for stock. There is no doubt that if the matter is pushed forward with the present energy, sufficient money will be raised within a short time to begin operations.

P. B. Wachtel, the Petoskey banker, has commenced his new job as clerk of the committee on enrolled bills at Washington, and they say his coat tails will soon forget that they ever swung pendant. Clerk of this committee takes all the bills to the president as soon as they are enrolled, and is selected, usually, for his ability as a runner, a qualification that Mr. Wachtel has had some practice at, although he never yet won a race.—Detroit News.

A report comes from the north woods that several camps employed in getting out cedar have been closed in the vicinity of Les Cheneaux island near Preniss bay on account of the deep snow. Five hundred men are out of employment. The provisions at hand are said to be short, and unless the men are able to find employment soon, distress must follow. Neighboring towns, however, will probably provide for them if necessity dictates.

The Indian Commissioner writes to Congressman Fisher as follows: "I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 17th inst., inclosing a letter from A. J. Blackbird, a member of the Ottawa and Chippewa tribes of Indians, in which he refers to certain claims alleged to be unpaid and due to his people. In reply I have to advise you that so far as the records in this office show, there is not one dollar due these people, and they have been repeatedly notified of this fact." Poor injin must keep on killing the porcupine and woodchuck.

Cheboygan Tribune: There is no state in the Union where farming brings in better returns than in Michigan. There is no county in Michigan where farming pays better than in Cheboygan county. As a proof of the latter statement, we would cite an instance that came to our knowledge this week. It is only a short time since Mr. Davis began developing a farm in Grant township, near Phillips' lumbermen's hotel. He has only 8 or 10 acres cleared on his farm, and yet he has sold nearly $400 worth of potatoes, cabbages, rutabagas, etc., raised on that small amount of ground last season, this winter already, besides the amount used himself. Where is there a section where a farmer can do better?

Indian Agent Stevens has been visiting Washington to secure the approval of the Indian office to a scheme which he has on foot. It is to provide for an industrial training school for the Michigan Indians, to be established at some place in the State. It is learned further, that the Indian office is very favorably disposed toward the proposition, and that it will meet with its first send-off from that quarter. The commissioner is said to be preparing a bill to carry out this idea, and that the result will be a proposition providing such an institution as those now in operation in Hampton, Va., and Carlisle, Pa. It is not yet known who will introduce it, but probably Mr. Fisher will be the gentleman selected. It will meet with the very general support of the Michigan delegation. An effort should be made to secure the institution in this part of the state, as this is the center of the Indian population.

Kalkaska Leader: Quite a number of the citizens of this county are firm in the belief that the G. R. & I. R. R. has forfeited its title to the valuable lands now held by that company in this and neighboring counties, and that what is commonly termed railroad lands will in the near future be subject to homestead entry or thrown on the market by the government. We are inclined to the opinion, however, that in this they are mistaken. The company in question has too firm a grip on these valuable lands to be shaken loose even by Uncle Sam, and we have seen nothing to warrant the belief that anything of the sort was ever seriously contemplated. That the railroad company is retarding the development of the country and keeping out many actual settlers by setting too high a figure on their lands is an evident fact, and it also proves that they have no fear of losing their title by forfeiture. It would be a grand thing for this county if every inch of railroad land in it could be placed on the market and sold only to actual settlers at a reasonable price, but we have no idea that it will be just the same.

East Jordan Enterprise: Chas W. Sutton left with his family this week for southern Michigan. He has rented his household furniture to W. L. French, his former business partner, and successor in the business. ——Judge Keat goes to Battle Creek and Chicago next week. ——Ex-Supervisor Hiram B. Hipp talks of going to California.——The Boyne Citizen says there is talk of putting down an experimental gas well at that place. All will concede that there are good surface indications. ——Sol. C. Isaman returned from Lansing last week, where he has been in reference to the accepting of his old State road job. He was successful, and was allowed $2,240. Perseverance is what tells.——E. N. Clink and E. A. H. Cole are over in Antrim county, working up a descriptive directory.——As the result of a drunken fight at a saloon on Friday night, John Golden paid $13.50 in costs, and the fine the next morning, and Chas. Sherwin, who pleaded not guilty, went to trial. While the jury were out Sherwin skipped his bail, and the sureties on his bond will have the privilege of defending the same in circuit court.

Dr. Talmage's Third Sermon to the Women of America.

"Broken Promises of Marriage" the Subject of his Discourse—Betrothal Is an Act So Solemn That to Break It Is an Everlasting Wrong.

BROOKLYN, Jan. 22.—The Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., preached this morning the third of his series of "Sermons to the Women of America, with Important Hints to Men." His subject was "Broken Promises of Marriage," and his text from Judges xi, 35: "I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and I cannot go back." He said:

Gen. Jephthah, the commander-in-chief of the Israelitish forces, is buckling on the sword for the extermination of the pestiferous Ammonites, and looking up to the sky he promises that if God will give him the victory he will put to death and sacrifice as a burnt offering the first thing that comes out from the door of his homestead when he goes back. The hurrahing of triumph soon runs along the line of all the companies, regiments, and divisions of Jephthah's army. A worse beaten enemy than those Ammonites never strewed any plain with their carcasses. Gen. Jephthah, fresh from his victory, is now on his way home. As he comes over the hill and through the valleys the whole march homeward for his men is a cheer, but for him a great anxiety, for he remembers his vow to slay and burn the first [illegible]

... well know the force of a marital engagement. In obedience to some rustic idea he, standing on one side the brook Ayr, and Mary Campbell on the other, they bathed their hands in the water and then put them on the boards of the Bible, making their pledge of fidelity. On the cover of the Old Testament of that book in this day, in Robert Burns' handwriting, may be found the words "Leviticus, xix, 12: Ye shall not swear by my name falsely; I am the Lord." And on the cover of the New Testament, in his own handwriting: "Matthew, v, 33: Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths."

Suppose a ship Captain offers his services to take a ship out to sea. After he gets a little way he comes alongside of a vessel with a more beautiful flag, and which has perhaps a richer cargo and is bound for a more attractive port. Suppose he rings a bell for the engineer to slow up and the wheel stops. Now I see the captain being lowered over the side of the vessel into a small boat, and he crosses to the gayer and wealthier craft, and climbs up the sides, and is seen walking the bridge of the other ship. I pick up his resigned speaking trumpet and I shout through it: "Captain, what does this mean? Did you not promise to take this ship to Southampton, England?" "Yes," says the Captain, "but I have changed my mind and I have found I can do better, and I am going to take charge here. I shall send back to you all the letters I got while managing that ship and and everything I got from your ship, and it will be all right." You tell me that the worst fate for such a Captain as that is too good for him. But it is just what a man [illegible]

... certain good reasons for divorcement. The Bible recognizes them. Good society recognizes them. But it must be the very last resort, and only after all reasonable attempts at reclamation and adjustment have proved a dead failure. When such attempts fail it is generally because of meddlesome outsiders, and women tell the wronged wife how she ought to stand on her rights, and men tell the wronged husband how he ought to stand on his rights. And let husband and wife in an unhappy marriage relation stand punctiliously on their rights, and there will be no readjustment, and only one thing will be sure to them, and that is a hell on earth.

If you are unhappily married, in most cases I advise you to make the best you can of an awfully bad bargain. Do not project your peculiarities more than is necessary. Perhaps you may have some faults of your own which the other party in the marital alliance may have to suffer. You are in the same yoke. If you pull aside the yoke will only twist your neck. Better pull ahead. The world is full of people who made mistakes about many things, and among other things about betrothal and marriage, and yet have been tolerably happy and very useful in the strength of God, and by the grace promised in every time of need if those who seek it conquer the disadvantageous circumstances. I am acquainted with lovely women married to contemptible men, and genial men yoked with termagants inspired of the devil. And yet under these disadvantages my friends are useful and happy. God helps people in other kinds of martyrdom and to sing in the flame, and he will help you in your lifelong misfortune. [illegible]

A DELUSION AND A SNARE.

Inimical Attitude of Cleveland's Administration Toward Civil-Service Reform.

Mr. Hale in a Spirited Speech in the Senate Lays Bare Its Hypocritical Professions.

Figures Show that the Old Motto, "To the Victors Belong the Spoils," Still Lives and Prospers.

We present below an abstract of Senator Hale's able speech in support of his resolution for the appointment of a select committee to examine into the present condition of the civil service. The Maine Senator said:

At the commencement of Mr. Lincoln's administration the public offices were filled with the adherents of that party which was the exponent of the doctrine that to the victors belong the spoils. Under that administration the chief test of fitness was loyalty. Not a few of those then appointed had within the last three years been turned on the cold charities of the world to make place for men who never had sympathy with the principles of which Mr. Lincoln had stood as the great representative. Grant and President Hayes had during their administrations recognized the growing sentiment of the country in favor of civil-service reform, and had endeavored to conform [illegible]

[illegible]

... satisfaction must be that he had come into closer accord with the leaders of the party, that they now accepted him, that Senators who two years ago had been denouncing his impracticable theories were to-day most earnestly in his favor, and that in the future he would be called upon to make but few more promises.

Passing on to the subject of political assessments, Mr. Hale quoted from the Washington Post, which he spoke of as the organ of the administration, of the 1st of November last, in regard to the collection of contributions for the New York campaign, and also a communication in the Washington Republican, describing how assessments for that campaign were being levied in the Government Printing Office. From all this something ought now to be plainly seen by every man who is not stone blind.

The value of the cry of "Civil Service Reform" had ceased to be of any estimation in the minds of the leaders of the Democratic party. Its canvasses would hereafter go on in the old fashioned way. The influence of the administration would be as penetrating, as controlling in all the States in party management, as it had ever been in the old palmy days of Democracy before the war. Wielding a controlling influence, marking out the paths of the party, shaping its course, breaking down opposition, enforcing discipline, deriding and defying the orders against partisan activity, would be found the immense body of Federal officeholders as obedient to the orders of the administration as were the Janissaries to the bidding of an Eastern despot. This year the land would rock with the efforts on behalf of the Presidential candidates. He affirmed his belief, and ventured the prediction that no means and no appliances that had been in years past used by the Democratic party would fail to be resorted to this year. Intimidation, outrage, murder, if needed, would open again a bloody grave in which would be entombed anew the free ballot of the South. The immense forces of officeholders would be marshaled to the conflict, and would be seen and heard and felt everywhere. Nor would it stop there. Every piece of work performed by contract for the Government [illegible]

SAM HOUSTON'S LONG-KEPT SECRET

The Reason Why He Deserted His Bride and Went to Live Among the Indians.

The blank in the history of the famous Houston has at last been filled up. It will be remembered that after living for some time among the Cherokee Indians, and fighting in the war of 1812, he settled in Tennessee, began to practice law, was twice elected to Congress, and in 1827 was elected Governor of Tennessee, and in January, 1829, he was married to the belle of Tennessee, and in less than two months after his marriage he suddenly resigned the Governorship, deserted his wife and home, and disappeared. This created an intense sensation throughout the country, as Houston was regarded as the most promising man in the South. The cause of Houston's resignation of the Governorship; his desertion of his bride, and his abandonment of the path of civilization has always been a mystery. He never revealed it himself to his civilized friends. A staff correspondent of the St. Louis Republican, sent to Tahlequah, I. T., to write up the Indian troubles, obtained from undoubted authority facts that clear up this mystery.

When Houston resigned the Governorship he made straight from Tennessee's capital to the Arkansas River. He fell in with a band of Osage Indians near the present site of Fort Gibson, told them he desired to live with the tribe, and he was welcomed. He donned a breech-clout and blanket, shaved his head to the crown, and daubed his face with paint. He cut himself off entirely from civilization and lived with the Indians.

For a time he was a leader, and married an Indian girl, but afterward he became a drunkard. While under the influence of whisky he told the story of his flight from Tennessee to John Jorley, an Indian companion. Jorley told it to Wolf Star, and from the latter the correspondent got it.

Houston's wife married him to please her parents. She had been previously engaged to a young man in Nashville, but, under parental influence, broke off the engagement and accepted Houston's offer of marriage, and, in view of his prospects, it was thought she had made a brilliant match. He loved the young woman and was made to believe that she returned his affection. Houston had no knowledge of the previous engagement, and his wife managed to maintain outward cheerfulness for some time. He returned home one night about 11 o'clock, and his wife was in bed and she was weeping. The husband was solicitous and the wife fretful. He asked what caused her tears, and she gave no satisfactory answer. He importuned her, and at last she told him.

She said she was a bad, wicked woman; that she did not love her husband, but loved another man; that she never could love her husband or forgot the other man, and that her life was miserable. She confessed that for some time before she had been engaged to marry Houston she had maintained illicit relations with the other man. Houston never said a word, but immediately went to his office, wrote out his resignation as Governor, saddled a horse, and rode into the wilderness. This is the mystery of Houston's life as revealed by himself.

Houston kept a little store among the Indians, and always had a barrel of whisky on tap. He drank all the time. In this way he lived for a couple of years. He finally went to Texas, where his brilliant career as a soldier in the Texas war, as President of the Texas Republic, and Senator from the State of Texas is well known.—St. Louis letter.

Tartars as Boycotters.

I should not for a moment imagine that the Crim Tartars have learned much of the Irish agrarian science of boycotting through the channels of the Russian press, as the Russian vernacular is only very imperfectly understood among them. Yet they have developed during recent years a system of boycotting the German proprietors in the Crimea which appears to have been highly successful. The lands formerly apportioned by the Crown to 30,000 Tartars in the Crimean peninsula have through the nomadic habits and ignorance of these people been gradually and easily acquired by the princely and other large proprietors for what may, in these instances be very appropriately termed old songs. These lands have been sub-leased in most cases to the ubiquitous and enterprising Germans. All these estates are worked by Tartar labor, and so long as the proprietor was there or a descendant of one of the old Tartar chieftain families, things went smoothly. A German agriculturist with capital a few years ago discovered in these broad tracts and cheap bargains a promising field for enterprise, with the prospect never absent from the Russo-German's vision of gradually ousting and supplanting the native. This, however, required time, but the German reckoned on the long-suffering patience of the industrious, sober, ignorant, and stolid-looking Mongolian laborer. The result has proved the German proprietor to have been a long way out of his sanguine reckoning. In many cases he acquired estates covering areas of from 50,000 to 200,000 acres, but the entry of the German into the possession of his estates was the signal for a rapid migration of every Tartar laborer and herdsman. The Tartar proprietors, who were his neighbors, refused the services of their horses, oxen, and camels at any price, no matter how tempting. The store-keepers in the neighboring towns and fairs would not supply the German's wants. This Tartar boycotting has now succeeded in driving the greater number of the German proprietors to abandon their estates and holdings at ruinous losses. The Governor of the district has now submitted a project to the Imperial Government for the repurchase of these lands and their division among the Tartars. It is further proposed that in addition to these Crown grants of small holdings to some 25,000 Tartars the Government shall in all necessitous cases supply each Tartar family with a few necessary agricultural implements and a yoke of oxen. There is little doubt that this project will not be accepted by the Government.—London Daily News.

CHARLEVOIX, FEB. 8, 1888.

General and Political.

Chicago Inter-Ocean: Canada would be pleased with free trade with the United States. It would double the value of her now cheap lands. The United States will continue to contribute cashiers and boodlers to Canada, but it is not yet ready to turn over the interests of the working masses.

Two sons of Burchard, who said that the democracy means Rum, Romanism and Rebellion, have got good positions under Cleveland's administration, and now the old man has gone over to the democracy himself, and is talking for that party. The three R's therefore must give place to the three B's—Burchard, Boodle and Buncombe.

The indications are that the democratic majority in the present house will not allow the admission of Dakota as a state this session. The only reason is a political one. Dakota is republican and no matter how just her claims may be for admission the "reformers" do not propose to admit her unless they can in some way neutralize her vote.

The House select committee on the election of President, vice President and Representatives in Congress has agreed to report favorably to the House the Crain resolution proposing an amendment to the constitution substituting the 31st day of December for the 4th day of March for the commencement of the and termination of the official term of the members of the House of Representatives and providing that Congress shall hold its annual meeting on the first Monday in January.

New York Tribune: The president's message has had one excellent effect. It has brought to an end all the Mugwump twaddle about his devotion to civil service reform. It was a dishonest pretence from the beginning, but the changes were wrung upon it month after month as if it were a real issue. All that nonsense has ceased. The president is now a tariff reformer, if you please. The civil service farce has played out and the free-trade afterpiece has been rung up.

The Newspaper Law.

The following is the law as it stands relative to newspapers and subscriptions:

1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary are considered as wishing to continue their subscriptions.

2. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the postoffice, whether directed in his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not, is responsible for payment.

3. If a person orders his paper discontinued he must pay arrears, or the publisher may continue to send it until payment is made and then collect the whole amount, whether the paper is taken from the postoffice or not.

4. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers or periodicals from the postoffice, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is prima facie evidence of intentional fraud.

From Banks.

This has been a mighty dull winter in Banks so far.

It is getting to be a ground hog situation. You must pay your taxes this month.

Mr. Clug, of Ellsworth, is handling the Roger Ingalls mill now and making some good lumber.

Raphel Kanagy came home from Kewadin last week, laid up with a game arm, the result of having it tattoed.

Frank Wheeler who came here last fall, became homesick and returned to the bosom of his family last week.

The old weather machine slipped a cog last week and failed to grind out the usual allowance of snow storms, in short, we had some very fine weather, and the roads are passable.

Two prominent citizens of this town wagered a box of cigars lately on whether eastern or western Banks will first have a Rail Road. We would like to know what uncle Richard will do with them if he wins. He don't smoke.

Charley Brown, of Mancelona, smiled on his Atwood friends the past week, and engaged to teach the band again for several months during the coming season. The boys expect to furnish campaign music next fall that will make things jar.

Additional Local News.

[illegible]

—When the trains on the T. A. A. & C. road get stuck in the drifts, the neighboring farmer fetches up his steers and hauls them out.

—Capt Carroll, of Horton's Bay, is very ill with strangulated hernia. Drs. Christen and [illegible] were in consultation on the case Monday.

—Cadillac amateurs played "Virginius" a few nights ago, and the fair young Roman Maiden was stabbed and disposed of with neatness and dispatch.

—A citizen of Mancelona, who went to Washington Territory to grow up, and would come back to Michigan if he could raise the car fare, writes back that he honestly believes the mud in his section is as deep as the snow in Antrim county.

—The new law imposing a tax on mortgages is circumvented by Allegan county holders by assigning them to non residents. Over $250,000 such assignments have been recorded at Allegan during a single week. Not only will the law impose additional burdens on borrowers, but there will be even less tax collected on the securities than heretofore.

—Prohibitionists of the 11th Congressional district have nominated for congress Rev. S. S. Steele, whose home now is at Manistique, with his daughter, Mrs. R. A. Campbell. Mr. Steele is about 75 years old, and a most estimable man. The prohibition third party members will vote for Mr. Steele, thus giving the tax [illegible] 200 to 300 more votes than he really ought to have.

—The churches waived their prayer meetings Thursday evening, and came together at the M. E. Church to attend the lecture of Mrs. E. [illegible] Wright on the subject of Local Prohibition. The speaker coming late found the ministers in charge had the meeting well under way. The singing was led by W. A. Smith, and Rev. McCartney led off the subject by some excellent remarks. Mrs. Wright found the subject already so thoroughly agitated, she thought it scarcely necessary that she should speak at all. She, however, gave a very interesting address, showing forth in apt illustrations the great evils of intemperance. *

—The Beaver Island mail arrived at Cross Village a few days ago, and returned the next day. It was the first communication the islanders have had with the outside world since the middle of December. Three days were consumed in making the journey to the mainland, as the carrier had to stay on an island two nights and wait for the ice to form on which to cross. His dogs carried him 15 rods on ice formed the night before which scarcely bore their weight. He stopped them, and alighting from the sleigh he lay down on his stomach, and spreading himself "out there" managed to thaw himself to them [illegible].

—The board of inspectors of steam vessels have settled the wheel chain question by adopting unanimously a committee recommendation to rescind all rules and regulations that obligated masters and pilots on the lakes and seaboard to have their wheel chains rove so that their helm and wheel move in the same direction. The committee in their report say that while recognizing the advisability of adopting a uniform rule for steering of all steam vessels, yet they do not feel warranted in making such a change as the petitioners request, in view of the number of vessels steered with straight chains. In the opinion of the committee it would not be safe to change the present mode of steering as most officers on these steamers on these steamers have steered with cross chains from boyhood, and if the present mode of steering these boats were changed it might result in some serious disaster and loss of life.

—East Jordan Enterprise: The local option meeting at the town hall, on Friday night was well attended, the room being comfortably filled and much interest manifested. The speaker was the Rev. W. H. McCartney, of Charlevoix, who is well known and a great favorite in this town. His speech on this subject was bright and taking, and was interrupted frequently with applause. As an evidence of the versatility of the speaker, and the readiness with which he can adapt his words to any occasion, however unexpected. An incident that occurred during the progress of his speech was very indicative. The Marshal of the village and Esquire Barbour, who were in the audience, were beckoned from the room and presently a note was handed to the effect that they were called out to take action in regard to a drunken fight that was then in progress. Mr. McCartney received the note, but did not read it until he had finished his period, then he casually glanced at it, proceeded with his speech without a break, and in a moment or two made a tremendous sensation by announcing that even now, while the good people of the town are together for the purpose of endeavoring to repress the traffic that brutalizes men, a disgraceful fight is in progress in a saloon in the village. The transition was easy, and the climax was as complete and symmetrical as it could have been had been a regular part of the speech.

Independent Order of Good Templars.

At the meeting of the I. O. G. T. lodge Monday evening, the following officers were installed by Lodge Deputy, W. W. Washburne, for the quarter ending May first: C. T., Mrs. Josie Dartt; V. T., Elmer Mayne; Secretary, H. L. Brink; F. S., Edith Phelps; Treas., W. W. Washburne; Chaplain V. F. Thurston; Marshal, Fred Hennings; I. G., Cloie McCartney; O. G., Charles Jeffries.

"Now dear George, I do wish you would get me one of those lovely valentines at Hines & Co's, they are just beauties."

The Mortgage Tax Law.

[illegible] would be just so much increase taxation on other property, and especially with the idea that it would lighten the burden of the small tax taxpayer, the man with a little home with perhaps a mortgage on it; but, if the object was to secure the ultimate repeal of the law taxing mortgages [illegible] so as to deduct the amount of the mortgage pro rata from the assessed value of the property it covers, they could not have taken a better way to accomplish it than by voting for a measure, the object of which is to strictly enforce the mortgage tax. I voted against the law for I saw as clearly then, as nearly everybody seems to see now, that the enforcement of the law taxing mortgages would be a great imposition on many people who have borrowed money on mortgages, for the tax will generally come out of them and not out of the mortgagees. Very many mortgages, especially for small amounts on small farms and workingmen's homes, are overdue; the parties holding the mortgage want only their interest and would be glad to give all the time wanted; but now most of them insist upon immediate payment or that the debtor shall pay the mortgage tax. On mortgages not yet due the holders will have to pay the tax until they can assign them to citizens of other states and this is what most of them will do, and so dodge the tax after all. All new loans of Michigan money will be either at a rate of interest enough higher to pay the tax, or the mortgage will have a clause binding the borrower to pay it. A man who has a home worth $2,000 with a $1,000 mortgage on it really has but $1,000 interest in it; but he pays taxes on it just the same as though there were no mortgage on it. Now if you tax the mortgage too, this tax will be ultimately shifted upon his shoulders. [illegible] or taxed they should be assessed at [illegible] as [illegible] property [illegible] of the mortgage to be deducted from the assessed value of the property. There is no question that capitalists often escape much taxation they ought to pay, but that is no reason why the taxes which they ought should be collected out of the men who have to borrow their money. Mr. Ramsey, of Ingham county, just after the passage of the bill in the house, moved to amend its title so as to read, 'An act to increase the rate of interest in Michigan,' this is just the effect the law must have in fact it has already had that effect. No opposition, however, on the supporters of [illegible] from the best of motives. The vote in the senate was non partisan, the same as in the house.

—George H. Van Pelt is home at Norwood again from Chicago. —Engineer Roak wants the Council to provide a heater for the steam fire engine. NATIONAL BANK.

Charlevoix To Have One of Those Useful Establishments in the Near Future.

The SENTINEL has known for some time that a scheme was on foot among several of our leading business men, with the Bank of Charlevoix at the head, to establish a National Bank here, but preferred to defer any announcement until the matter should assume an aspect of certainty.

We can now state by authority that the necessary $50,000 stock was secured last week, and by reference to our advertising columns it will be seen that a meeting is called for this evening to elect officers and do other necessary preliminary business.

"The First National Bank of Charlevoix," will succeed the present Bank of Charlevoix, and, we surmise, be officered by W. P. Brown as President, W. A. Brown as Cashier, and G. B. Brown as Teller.

We are of the opinion that this enterprise will prove of more substantial benefit to Charlevoix than any amount of advertising that the Business Men's Association could devise, to say nothing of the direct financial [illegible] which attends it. There is a "boom" in the circulation of its currency.

It will insure it the solid and growing benefit of imparting to Charlevoix a financial status which even the Michigan Tradesman cannot depreciate.

Sudden Death of Mrs. Robert Miller, of This Place

Mrs. Robert Miller, of this place, died suddenly of heart disease, at her home, on Monday afternoon last.

Mrs. Miller had been ill for the previous ten days, but her friends did not consider her in any especial danger, therefore the announcement of her death was a shock to the community.

Mrs. Emme Miller was an old resident of Charlevoix, a lady of sterling character and unusual industry; respected by her neighbors and beloved by her family. She leaves no children of her own, but her attachment to her step daughter, Mrs. Aggie Jarvis, partook of the elements of true motherhood, and who, in her turn, reciprocated the affection.

Mrs. Miller was a member of Christ Episcopal Mission Church, and with the rites of that body she will be buried this afternoon.

Historical Society.

A very pleasant evening was spent in the parlors of Dr. and Mrs. Carlstein on Friday evening last. The following programme was presented by the Executive Committee: An instrumental selection by Mrs. Guyles; a select reading by Miss Cochran; the paper—"Tory and the Monarchy" by Miss Carrie Hilton, followed by a duet by Dr. Carlstein and Mrs. L. M. Clark. After intermission, a quartet by Dr. Carlstein, W. A. Smith, Miss Florence Smith and Mrs. R. W. Kane; a select reading by Rev. W. G. Clark; a duett by Mesdames Hines and Clark. The conversation, led by Mrs. McCartney, was participated in quite generally. Mrs. Guyles will entertain the Society at the residence of Mrs. L. M. Clark next Friday evening. The paper, "The England of Elizabeth," by Mrs. C. J. Greer. The conversation will be led by R. W. Kane and Mrs. H. M. Enos. Subject, "Kenilworth." [The editor is under especial obligation to Miss Lana Washburn for the report of the Society meetings.]

BLACK CARLO.

BY ANNA VERKS FRITSCH.

Let other poets soar on wing loftier flight,
Nor rest until she reach Parnassus' height,
My muse soars not so high, but is contented quite
To sing the praises of Carlo.

This youthful ... lived near my home
And oft at evening I see him roam
Over the fields, while "Hercules" scamper home,
Urged by the bark of Carlo.

His duty nobly does, he trots along behind
His master with serene and happy mind,
While gracefully waves in the evening wind
The lengthy plume of Carlo.

His master teaches him to walk in wisdom's way,
That which concerns him not to let alone, to stray
Not from the safe confines of home, lest some fair day
To grief should come black Carlo.

He also taught him that no gentleman's hound
Will worry neighbors' cats, or on the road be found
Barking at passing horses. With such a kind
Precepts, how could young Carlo

Fail to become ... brightly shining light,
Which in ... quite
All other dogs, though blacker is than night
The glossy coat of Carlo.

A LOST DAY

How many tasks I planned at dawn!
I said: "When this fair day is gone,
And I sit down at evening still
To count the work my hands have done
Between the rise and set of sun,
I shall be fully satisfied."

And then I wove a web of dreams,
And hours slipped by like sunny streams,
I ... in ... tranquil flight.
And when I roused myself, at last,
To act, I found the day was past,
And sun ... fading into night.

Oh, foolish dreams! oh, wasted day!
This, and this only can I say:
"Not one good deed my hands have done,"
But much I might have done, had I
But used the hours as they passed by,
But I have squandered every one.

God gives his days for us to use
For some good purpose ... we choose
To squander them, how great our sin;
I shudder when I think He keeps
A record of the ... and weeps
To see the ... thereon.

Oh, ye who give to idle dreams God's hours,
A serpent lurks beneath the flowers
Of idle ... and weak delay,
Rouse! make to-morrow's record fair,
Be this the single entry there:
"To-day atones for yesterday."

The Stolen Fortune

BY Abbie C. McKeever

CHAPTER XIII—CONTINUED.

"Dey'll be back, 'course dey'll be after that ar b'ar, and if I aint clean gone den dey'll cotch me sure."

Twilight was closing in fast, and the moon had not yet risen. The weird landscape of towering mountains, deep canyons and dangerous trails was not very cheering when one was anxious to press on rapidly.

But Skete possessed one excellent quality, and that was patience.

By and by the moon crept out from behind a brow of a mountain, and enabled Skete to distinguish the very faint trail and form some idea of the direction he was taking.

He had come now to a more level spot through whose gentle undulations a small mountain stream flowed slowly. There was grass and a few trees, mostly of spruce pine, and bunches of small cottonwoods and wild plums.

But where he was really, and where he wanted to go, was the least thing Skete knew; he had a dim conception that he would get back to the prairies after awhile, if he just kept moving on.

So he kept moving on, until another day opened, and once more he sought a sheltered nest in which to hide and rest, and allow his pony to graze. He was aware he had not passed over many miles, owing to the dangerous passes and roughness of the way.

Another day passed in comparative quiet and safety, and as the afternoon began to wane, Skete once more began his tedious journey, knowing that, as the moon did not rise until so late, he must now continue his trail in the daytime, and besides, as the way was more dangerous now, and the trail more obscure, Skete trusted much to the instinct of his pony in following it.

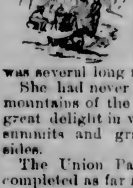
Several days passed in this very monotonous style, but one evening, when his delighted eyes beheld the prairie lands below him, Skete felt that he was indeed nearing home, and he could scarcely repress a cry of rapturous joy.

"Miss Nora! Miss Nora, honey, Skete's a comin'; he hab been long gone, sure, but he's comin', truly he am."

With this thought in his brain, what was Skete's dismay and horror when a rude voice broke in with:

"Halt! you black rascal."

CHAPTER XIV.



TO Nora the delight of a gallop on the back of her own pet pony was the best tonic that could have been offered.

...

for her pony to turn in the path, for either heavy, impassable bushes hedged them in or sudden shelving rocks and deep canons, where a misstep was certain death.

The day was nearing its close, and Nora looked about her in alarm.

"Oh, Pussy, pet, what are we to do?" she exclaimed aloud. "I kept thinking as we proceeded that we would find a place where we could turn around and retrace our steps. But the way only gets wilder and more dangerous, and the trail is now leading down the mountain side to where—I haven't the least idea. It looks, my pet, very much as if we were actually lost in the Rockies."

"What will you give me to lead you out, my fair maid?" said a voice just at her side that so startled Nora she gave forth a cry of surprised terror as a large man, heavily bearded, stepped forth from a bush and regarded her keenly, evidently much amused at her lovely, frightened face.

"Oh," gasped Nora, "I—how you scared me, sir. But I am very anxious to return to Cheyenne. I was very foolish to trust myself alone in the mountains. They will be so alarmed about me."

The man drew his large hat further over his brows, and, rifle in hand, grasped the pony's bridle and proceeded down the mountain path slowly and cautiously.

"Well—can we not turn about and retrace our steps soon?" pleaded Nora.

"There is no way of gittin' out of this scrape, Miss, but to push right on straight ahead. I calculate you'll not see Cheyenne to-night."

"Oh, dear! what shall I do? Is there a habitation near here—some settler on the mountains that you know of where——"

"There's no place nearer than five miles, through the roughest country you ever did see, Miss. I guess you'll have to put up with what us boys can offer, for the present."

Nora wondered what he meant by "us boys," but concluded it must be a party of hunters camping near. She was right. Just as the sun hid its smiling face behind a mountain, she saw a camp fire, around which were clustered a half-dozen rough-looking hunters.

"Hallo, Jim, is that the sort of game you bring in?" laughed one of the men, coarsely.

"It's the kind I bring in to-night. This yer gal got lost in the trail, an' I brought her out. She's anxious to return to Cheyenne to-night, she says. Any o' you fellows want to guide her over the mountains?"

No one answered, and Jim continued:

"I told her she'd have to put up with the best we could offer fur the present, an' in the morning I reckon some o' you uns can take her back as far as the road."

Night had now set in, and Nora, weary and full of fears in her present doubtful friends, dismounted and approached the fire.

The coarse, rude faces and forms about her did not reassure her. She knew that usually Western scouts and trappers were courteous and extremely kind to all women in distress; but these men although they were buckskin and had every appearance of the brave hunter, had also a brigandish air that caused her a nameless terror.

As she approached the fire where the savory odor of broiling meat greeted her, the men drew back slightly and viewed her extremely pretty face and figure in much surprise. Ladies such as she were not often out in the mountains alone.

Jim had attended to her weary pony and drew near them, but before he had spoken a word a sound of horses' hoofs rang out down the mountain side, and the men looked at each other in surprise, more than one placing their hands upon their revolvers.

"It's the Captain," said some one. "I know it's him by the way he rides. Yes, here he is."

Nora turned her head and wondered carelessly who "the Captain" was. As she did so the blaze of the fire brought out plainly her fair face and girlish figure, and it also fell upon the approaching stranger, who lifted his hat with a graceful bow, and Nora gazed full in the handsome, cruel face of her enemy, Dan Le Fane.

CHAPTER XV.

which he rode, and as a full comprehension of his intentions burst upon them more than one smiled grimly upon the other.

The night was far spent, their way had been over rough, mountainous roads and passes, and at last they had reached a plain, but the surroundings were wholly unfamiliar to Nora.

Her suspicions that she was being carried further and further from Cheyenne were now almost confirmed.

"You are misleading me," she exclaimed; "you are not returning me to friends. I might have known better than ever to have trusted you, Mr. Le Fane. Pray, where are you taking me?"

The man laughed his peculiar, scornful laugh, and, peering into her troubled, indignant face through the surrounding gloom, replied:

"Oh! not very far off. Are you weary? We will take a rest before long."

"But why did you not take me to Mrs. Clifton, as you promised?"

"You shall return to your benefactress before long. I merely wish you to make me a visit in the meantime."

"Do you live in this wild country?"

"Yes, sometimes; my old home is up in the mountains north of us. We will reach there by and by; in the meantime do not be alarmed. I give you my word—the word of a gentleman—that you shall be treated only with courtesy from us all. Now, boys, here is a friendly bluff and a stream of water and plenty of grass. We will dismount, have our breakfast and take a few hours' much-needed rest. Miss Fairleigh looks very weary."

After partaking of a few mouthfuls of broiled meat and a cracker, Nora, overcome with weariness, permitted her captor to arrange her a bed of blankets and went to sleep calmly, notwithstanding her strange and doubtful surroundings.

It was high noon when the voice of Dan Le Fane aroused her.

"Come, Miss Fairleigh, we cannot delay longer; we must be moving on soon. The boys are just down the river a ways. I will join them now with your blankets. If you desire to bathe your face and arrange your toilet, there is the river; it will answer for all purposes." And, with a smile, the man gathered up the blankets and strode off, with:

"Follow me as soon as you can, Miss Fairleigh; the boys are growing impatient."

She wandered down to the river bank, bathed her face, tucked up her tumbled hair the best she could, and gazed about her, wondering if there was any chance for her escape.

The willows might conceal her for a time, but the men would surely find her, hide where she would.

"No, the time is not yet," she thought; "but whenever opportunity does offer I shall not hesitate."

Slowly she made her way to the group of men who stood near their ponies, and were evidently impatient to be off.

"Here is the best breakfast we can offer at present, but we promise you that when we reach Satan's Roost all the delicacies of mountain streams and forests shall be laid before you."

"Satan's Roost! Where is that?"

"That is the name of my former home, and where we are now bound; a really romantic, lovely place, such as young girls usually fancy—in novels."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

His Sunday Nose.

"I once knew a sea captain who came from about here," he continued, in a higher strain, "who had an encounter with a shark in his youth and lost his nose, and for the sake of harmony rather than vanity he had a tin false nose made to look as much like the lost feature as possible. When he went to sea he tried always to make his crew recognize the Sabbath with appropriate respect and observance; he, therefore, ingeniously had a silver nose made for himself, which he wore Sunday, keeping the tin nose for week days, and the signal was always respected, so far as he knew. Perhaps he never heard that the sailors always called the Sabbath "Silver-nose day," as they might well have easily been pardoned for doing.—Boston Post.

He was Practicing.

"I WANT a New-Year hat," said a sporting man to a stylish hatter.

"A New-Year hat! I've been in the business a great many years, sir, but I have never heard of a New-Year's hat," replied the proprietor of the hat-store.

"I want a hat that won't get tight on a man when he's making New-Year calls."

"I should think you would get a man who would not get tight while he accompanied the hat on its New-Year rounds."

The Golden Rule.

Bobby had been a pretty good boy all day, and his father was very much pleased.

"You will find, Bobby," said the old man, "that virtue is its own reward. I mean by that that every time you do what you ought to do you will feel

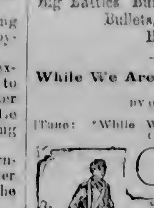
GREAT GUNS.

Soldiers' Stirring Stories of Solid Shot, Screaming Shells.

Big Battles Bursting Bombs, Burning Bullets, and Bright Bayonets.

While We Are Camping Together.



Hurrah! Hurrah! ... brighter day!
Yet we guard the sacred trust, as those who led the way;
While we are camping together.

Do not let the measure drag, but raise your voices high!
Sing it as our fathers used to sing in days gone by!
Shout the praise of Loyalty, and lead it to the sky!
While we are camping together.

Bring that "D. C." "hard-tack" now that time can never rot!
May it be an emblem of the Union we defend!
Lay it as a corner-stone to never break nor bend!
While we are camping together.

Yes the war is over, boys; but heaven's field of blue
Glitters with its starry host in unison so true,
Federals on high who sing for peace and Union, too,
While we are camping together.

Come, ye Veteran Boys in Blue, and help us sing the song!
Help us sing as loyal sons, the vanquishers of wrong!
Help us sing as if we were a hundred thousand strong!
While we are camping together.

Why the Soldiers Laughed.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

There is no class of men better entitled to enjoy genuine, innocent fun, than the soldiers serving in an active campaign. They are entitled to it, and they do enjoy it with a zest that I think other men cannot feel, for the reason that they have their lives in their hands, and the occurrences of the next hour or day might put them where humor is unknown. It was a relief for the brave fellows comprising our volunteer armies to relax a little occasionally; to turn from the stern business of war and fighting and lighten their condition with all kinds of fun and jest. That they did so, on occasion, most uproariously, I need not say to my veteran comrades. The soldier who could not stand a practical joke was out of place among the volunteers. And those who could take a joke, and were quick to retaliate in kind, found their cares much lightened, and the bond of comradeship strengthened. I am not by any means the only soldier whose stick-and-mud chimney, in winter quarters, refused to draw, and who discovered, upon examination, that some kind comrade had stuffed an old pair of blue pants into the opening. And I expect that I am but one of many such victims who discovered the author of that iniquity, and got more than even with him for the same. At least, I was one who did that thing.

When discipline was relaxed in favorable situations in camp or barracks, the "camp-elephant" used to be paraded about. It was the same animal that we have seen shown in parlors at home, when the young people get hilarious, but constructed on larger and more scientific principles. He was covered with army-blankets and blue overcoats in profusion; he had an immense motive power of human arms and legs under him, but carefully concealed; a soldier always bestrode him, a keeper walked by his side; a long blue pants-leg, tied at the end, was waved in the air for a trunk. Followed by a jovial procession, the elephant would make the circuit of the camp, and morose indeed was the officer who would not come out at the call of the animal and answer his salutation.

The negroes in Louisiana and Virginia furnished a constant fund of diversion for the soldiers. The sack-races, wheelbarrow-races, blindfold-races, and others of that class that I have seen since those days, seem but a faint imitation of the real thing that we were accustomed to have among the people who invented them. And sometimes, and not rarely, either, when we could get some venerable African, the date of whose birth was a mere matter of conjecture to himself, so far back toward the early days of the Republic was it, to twang his banjo and sing one of the pathetic slave-ditties of the South, and, later, to "pat" while a brisk and lithe-limbed young Freedman executed a dance in a style that Dan Bryant might have envied—then we thought we could tell something about the origin of the negro show

Yet all this had to be told them as a matter of news.

Everything possible was done by the fishermen to relieve his suffering, but he will probably die, as both feet and hands are badly frozen.

Several witnesses have been subpoenaed to appear at Detroit in the Albany flour case. A strong fight is promised between the Western transportation company of Buffalo, and the insurance company, in which the latter proposes to obtain remuneration by holding some one liable for the lost flour. Some 500 barrels of flour were set afloat from the vessel Albany of the Western transportation company's line during heavy weather last fall. Most of them were picked up along the beach near Cheboygan and appropriated for private sale or use. United States authorities recovered a considerable quantity of the flour. The legal proceedings alluded to are the outgrowth of difficulty in effecting an insurance settlement.

At St. Ignace on the 7th, William Sherman was killed and two others severely injured at the new Duluth, Shore & Atlantic railroad pier by a falling spile. Sherman leaves a widow with two children and was about 35 years of age. It is thought the coroner's jury will hold the foreman, who was managing the work, partially responsible. Mrs. Sherman was notified by some thoughtless person before her husband's body had been removed. It lay on the snow. The blood and bruises had not yet been washed away or dressed. She hurried to the place and covered the dead lips with kisses. Her own were colored by her husband's blood. While the body of Sherman was lying in an undertaking establishment, a thief stole a 50-cent silver piece placed on his eye to keep it closed and substituted a penny. He was arrested and locked up.

Cadillac News and Express: Judge Fallass will attend the Grand Lodge of Michigan I. O. O. F., which meets at Lansing, on the 21st of February. Though the ballots recently deposited by the proper officers of the several lodges will not be counted until the meeting of the Grand Lodge at Lansing, Judge Fallas has undoubtedly been chosen to serve as delegate to the Sovereign Grand Lodge, which will meet at Los Angeles, California, in September next.——George Davis and the other members of the T., A. A. & C. railroad prospecting party, returned from their trip to Frankfort last Saturday. Mr. Davis says that they traversed a comparatively good road route between this city and and Frankfort. He speaks in flattering terms of the country through which the road would go, from an agricultural standpoint, many splendid farms being now developed and the soil and general condition of the country being inviting for development of the whole.

Curious Freak of a Millionaire.

[illegible] ... of a plan which seemed to me so ingenious and so admirably calculated for dissipating any amount of money that I can not forbear recounting it. It seems that a young man found himself on the death of his father and mother in unrestricted possession of $1,500,000. When the period of mourning had expired, he bought a small circus, and traveled about with it in the capacity of chief showman. How long the fun lasted, or what sorry sum the circus properties fetched when they were sold at auction by the creditors of the concern, I am not informed. I have spoken lightly of this affair, and yet my higher nature revolts at such treatment of it. As we are all of us Hamlets, so do we all love the circus, admire the riders and acrobats, and cherish an undying affection for the clown. I would not give a pinch of salt for the man whose imagination is not aroused by the very word circus; and for my part I trust that the young man whom I have mentioned acquired such skill in his short career as a circus proprietor that he will be able to recover from the public, under those auspices, a part at least of the sum which he lost in his rash but excusable investment.—Boston Post.

Commercial Proverbs.

Men who have company must have money.

Some men carry too much sail, some too little.

Great men when analyzed usually prove to be very small men.

Men trade on borrowed reputation as they trade on borrowed capital.

Good intentions will not help a man on his way if he takes the wrong road.

The history of trade shows that failure is the rule and winning the exception.

Money moves the crops that make the great West the granary of the world.

One man is over-nice and becomes fussy; another is careless and loses his trade.

The same great lesson of failure is taught in the professions that is taught in trade.

One man ruins his business because he is sloven: another ruins it because he is a fop.

Men neither win nor lose in the same way. One fails and is smart; another wins and is dull.

Talent and temper often go together. It is rare to find a sharp, bright man that is a courteous man.

The merchants of old Tyre were "princes and her traffickers were the honorable of the earth.

Integrity, honesty and piety do not save a man from disasters if he fails to observe the laws of success.

The law of success is as certain as the law of the tides. All must obey these laws if they would prosper.

A diamond with a flaw is better than a pebble without. But the flaw adds nothing to the value of the diamond.

The Artist's Model.

In his reminiscences Mr. Frith, the English artist relates a charming story of that often maligned woman, the artist's model. To give it as he tells it: A female model was the sitter and was placed with her back to the student, half leaning, half reclining, in an attitude full of grace. I had arrived late and was compelled to take the only vacant seat at the end of the semi-circle, from which I had a view of the model's profile. The face was new to me; the attitude seemed a very easy one. I was, therefore, surprised to see tears slowly falling down the model's cheek. I thought I ought to draw the attention of the visitor to the fact and did so. "O no!" said Jones, "she can't be in pain, no. I think I know what distresses her. Take no notice. Go on with your work." The next night the sitting was repeated, but the tears were not, and I thought little more about the matter. A few months after this a very modest, respectable-looking girl was sent to me by a friend as a model and I engaged her at once for a picture I had just commenced. I found the girl was the daughter of a tailor in a very small way of business, and that she was in every particular a respectable person. It was not till after two or three sittings, and on looking again and again at her profile, that it struck me that I had seen the tears coursing each other down it in the life school. "Surely, Miss B——, I can not be mistaken; you sat for Mr. Jones at the Royal academy?" She blushed terribly, and the tears came again. "Now tell me why you did such a thing?" "I did it," she said, "to prevent my father going to prison. He owed £3 10s. ($17.50), and if he couldn't have paid it by that Saturday night he was to be arrested. The academy paid me 3 guineas for the week and saved him. I never sat in that way before, and I never will again." And I believe she never did. She is at the present time in a position of life far beyond anything she could have aspired to. She is a mother and a grandmother, and no one has any idea that she sat for a nude figure to save her father from prison.

Yet He Loves Her.

Man finds any amount of fault with a woman, yet works tooth and nail to get her. He calls her extravagant, yet yearns to pay her bills. She's heartless but he devotes months to finding the spot where that heart should be. She's fickle, yet he struggles for a place in her affections. She's fickle, yet he struggles for a place in her affections. She's timid, but he, noble creature, has courage for two. She's a fraud, but a darling. She's a goose, but a duck. She's snappy, and sweet. In fact, she's a chameleon, in the very latest style of spots and dots and feathers and fixings. She's lithe and graceful and dainty and dear—and changeable as the wind. Yet she's a most desirable article of household furnishing, and there are mighty few men who want to get along without her, chameleon—in a bustle—though she be.—San Francisco Report.

Omaha dame—I am sure you never tell stories, do you? Little girl—no, indeed. We have a servant to do that." "A servant?" "Yes'm. His name is Johnson. He tends to the door."—Omaha World.

An ancient omen says that "if two marriages are celebrated simultaneously one of the husbands will die." This omen is no doubt verified in every instance; but we are prepared to believe that the other husband will die too, if he lives long enough.—Norristown Herald.

His master mo... Such another an... found for love o... Nanni's occupation was gone. Disheartened and without resources, he finally engaged himself, with a number of his fellow countrymen, to work on the railroads. This employment in the course of time, brought him to the Catskill mountains.

When the line of the Ulster and Delaware railroad was first surveyed the region through which it passes had much more the air of a forest primeval than it possesses to-day. The principal "old settlers" then were the bears and panthers and wildcats, with here and there a rattlesnake. There was good sport in the mountains at that period.

One day a good-sized bear, closely pursued by two hunters, came tearing through the underbrush close by the place where Nanni and his companions were at work. It was a wild spot overlooking that stupendous ravine where the snowy veil of the Kaaterskill falls hangs gracefully down the black wall of wet rocks.

"Head him off!" cried the hunters.

But the Italian laborers were too frightened to dispute the passage of the panting animal. The mere sight of them, however, caused him to slacken his pace and look about him, his red tongue hanging out of his open mouth, and his mischievous little eyes flashing with rage and defiance.

Before him were the Italians, behind him the hunters. On one side was the precipice, and opposite stood Nanni—and he was not the man to run away.

If he trembled, it was from excitement and emotion—not from fear. The sight of the free, full-grown bear at bay, and rearing threateningly on his hind legs, caused a flood of recollections to rush through Nanni's mind. Inspired by the thought of his triumphant wrestling days, he had but one idea, and that was to get a good "side-hold" of the bear, throw him on his back, and capture him.

"Stop-a! stop-a!" he screamed, motioning back the hunters who had raised their guns to fire. "I'll catch-a him for you!"

To the speechless amazement of his comrades he rushed forward and grappled with the infuriated bear, throwing one arm around the plump, hairy body, and with the other hand clutching the shaggy throat.

The struggle was terrific while it lasted, and by no means one-sided. Bruin snapped with his jaws, and slapped out wildly with his huge paws, tearing great strips from Nanni's clothing at each blow. He did not seem to be at all particular whether bits of skin and flesh came with the cloth or not. Then the two fell and rolled in the dust. The spectators cried:

"They'll go over, as sure as——"

Before the sentence was out of their mouths, crash! went man and bear over the precipice together. The others heard the cracking of the branches as they fell and were lost to sight in the dense foliage that clothed the mountain-side.

Horror-stricken, the men scrambled down the rocks as best they could by roundabout ways to pick up poor Nanni's mangled body.

Mangled, indeed, he was when they found him, but not killed. He and the bear had providentially tumbled into a thicket of huckleberry bushes on a ledge half way down the ravine. Bruin had made off, leaving Nanni stunned, bleeding, and highly indignant.

"Dat-a bear no good-a," he said, in a feeble but protesting tone to his rescuers. "He not know-a how to wrestle. He not wrestle fair."

This is not a fable, but it has a moral: Don't expect good behavior from others, according to your own ideas of proper conduct, when you pay no regard to theirs.

NATURAL GAS IN CHICAGO.

The Flow Increasing Steadily—More Wells Discovered—The Leland Hotel Gas.

[Chicago special.]

It is now conceded that Chicago has a sufficient natural gas supply for practical domestic purposes. Low-pressure gas exists here, either in the shale or the Niagara rock, in sufficient volume so that the supply from a six-inch well, when freed from water, will be quite large enough to furnish fuel and light for the largest establishments in the city. The pressure, of course, is not strong enough to admit of the use of mains from which to distribute the gas at points distant from the mouth of the well, but the flow is held to be large enough from a single well to supply light and fuel to the extent of from $500 to $1,000 a month, or about $10,000 a year. This calculation is based upon a test jointly made by C. H. Dabney and J. H. Ralston, the result of which is decidedly interesting. Both of these gentlemen hold that the gas supply, found so far, comes from the Trenton limestone, and that it rises through fissures in the shale and other formations. But this sug- [illegible]

DOMINION OF FASHION.

Dr. Talmage's Fourth Sermon to the Women of America.

Dissimilarity in the Attire of the Sexes an Indication of Good Morals—A Masculine Woman and a Womanly Man Are Alike Repugnant.

BROOKLYN, Jan. 29.—The Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D. D., preached to-day in the Brooklyn Tabernacle the fourth of the series of "Sermons to the Women of America, with Important Hints to Men." The subject of the sermon was "Dominion of Fashion," and the text was from Deuteronomy xxii. 5: "The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garment: for all that do so are abomination unto the Lord thy God." Dr. Talmage said:

In this, the fourth sermon of the series of sermons, I wish those who hear to bear in mind that I take into consideration not only those whom I have before me on Sabbath days, but the wider audience opened through the printing press, and while some things may not be particularly appropriate for one locality, they are appropriate for [illegible]

[illegible] him squirm?" Others pride themselves on their outlandish apparel. They boast of being out of the fashion. They wear a queer hat. They ride in an odd carriage. By dint of perpetual application they persuade the world that they are perfectly indifferent to public opinion. They are more proud of being "out of fashion" than others are of being in. They are utterly and universally disagreeable. Their rough corners have never been worn off. They prefer a hedgehog to a lamb.

The accomplishments of life are in no wise productive of effeminacy or enervation. Good manners and a respect for the tastes of others are indispensable. The Good Book speaks favorably of those who are a "peculiar" people; but that does not sanction the behavior of queer people. There is no excuse, under any circumstances, for not being and acting the lady or gentleman. Rudeness is sin. We have no words too ardent to express our admiration for the refinements of society. There is no law, moral or divine, to forbid elegance of demeanor, or ornaments of gold, or gems for the person, artistic display in the dwelling, gracefulness of gait and bearing, polite salutation or honest compliments; and he who is shocked or offended by these had better, like the old Scythians, wear tiger skins and take one wild leap back into midnight barbarism. As Christianity advances there will be [illegible]

[illegible] filled with excitement and feasting; feet drafts of wine that make one not beastly intoxicated, but only fashionably drunk and luxurious indolence—are the instruments by which this unreal life pushes its disciples into valetudinarianism and the grave. Along the walks of prosperous life death goes a-mowing, and such harvests as are repeated! Materia medica has been exhausted to find curatives for these physiological devastations. Dropsies, cancers, consumptions, gout, and almost every infirmity in all the realm of pathology have been the penalties paid. To counteract the damage pharmacy has gone forth with medicament, panacea, elixir, embrocation, salve, and cataplasm.

To-night with swollen feet and cushioned ottoman, and groaning with aches innumerable, will be the votary of luxurious living, not half so happy as his groom or coal heaver. Wrong fashion is the world's undertaker, and drives thousands of hearses to Greenwood and Laurel Hill and Mount Auburn.

But, worse than that, this folly is an intellectual depletion. This endless study of proprieties and etiquette, patterns and styles, is belittling to the intellect. I never knew a woman or a man of extreme fashion that knew much. How belittling the study of the cut of a coat, or the tie of a cravat, or the wrinkle in a sleeve, or the color of a ribbon! How they are worried if something gets nettled, or [illegible]

FRYE ON PROTECTION.

An Able Speech by Senator Frye, of Maine, in the United States Senate.

How One of Mr. Cleveland's Free-Trade Friends Was Made a Protectionist.

Democratic Incapacity the Cause of the Large Surplus Now in the Treasury.

Mr. Frye made a vigorous speech in the Senate, on the 23d of January, on the issue of protection and free trade which the President makes. In the course of it he showed how Mr. Charles P. Kimball, of Chicago, Cleveland's Consul at Stuttgart, Germany, has been converted by European pauper labor to the doctrine of protection. Mr. Frye said: "At Stuttgart, an important manufacturing point, there is an immense corset factory, and the wages actually paid were not one-third of those in a like con- [illegible]

There was not the slightest doubt as to the attitude of the South on this question. When the South went into rebellion it declared in the Confederate Constitution that no bounty should ever be granted from the Treasury, nor any law be enacted to foster or encourage any branch of industry whatever. That had been the solemn declaration of Southern Democrats; and they believed now as they believed then. These Southern gentlemen learned very slowly, and forgot as slowly, and they were blind to-day to the marvels which were being wrought in their midst under a protective tariff. The Democratic party had come into power in the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress, and had held power in that House ever since, except in the Forty-seventh Congress; and it had illustrated its promotion to power by demanding that the tariff be revised and the whole business of the country disturbed. The Democratic Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means since then had been Fernando Wood (with Randolph Tucker as an assistant) and William R. Morrison—all three of them out-and-out free-traders; and to-day Mr. Mills, of Texas, was Chairman of that Committee— [illegible]

THE MEXICAN CUISINE.

A Fair Criterion of the Nation's Civilization.

[Philadelphia Record.]

It is an unquestionable fact that the [illegible] is a fair criterion of the civilization of any nation, and that of Mexico is as simple as the dress and manners of her people, writes a correspondent. No doubt the climate and Moorish architecture of the houses have much to do with it. In this hot country and in these windowless kitchens steady fires are out of the question. When gnarled and crooked sticks are bought by weight, at the rate of one and a half cents per pound, and coal, brought from great distances is $16 to $20 per ton, naturally economy in fuel is a prime consideration.

A typical Mexican kitchen has neither stove, table, chair, nor cupboard, the clean swept clay floor, an adobe shelf against the wall and a few hooks and pegs answering every purpose. In the houses of the rich an adobe range is built into the wall, which is really a long, narrow box made of sun-baked clay and partitioned off into little compartments, within each of which a handful of charcoal may [illegible]

Blaine Says No.

Hon. James G. Blaine has written a letter to Chairman Jones of the Republican National Committee. His letter opens as follows: "I wish through you to state to the members of the Republican party that my name will not be presented to the national convention called called to assemble in Chicago in June next for the nomination of candidates for president and vice-president of the United States." This action on the part of Mr. Blaine puts a different aspect upon the situation, and will, in our opinion, restore entire harmony to the party. And now for Bob Lincoln or Gen. Phil Sheridan. Either will do.

General and Political.

Berrien and Emmet counties vote on local option on the 28th.

The delicate operation of tracheotomy was performed upon the German Crown Prince lately, with apparent very good results.

Secretary Vilas is quoted as saying that the fundamental idea of the Democratic party is "Confidence in the people." The "fundamental idea" of the people, unfortunately, is lack of confidence in the Democratic party.

There are more office holders on the Democratic National Committee than there ever were on any Republican National Committee since 1861. But then, the Democratic National Committee has a bigger job on hand this year than it ever had before, and needs plenty of help.

Some of the heirs of John Roach are preparing to bring suit against the government for $2,500,000 damages, for its refusal to accept the ships which Mr. Roach built for it. So much partisanship was shown in the condemning of the Roach-built vessels, that the great ship builder's heirs may have more than a fighting chance to capture some of the bugaboo surplus.

The best evidence thus far furnished that Northern Michigan has gold in paying quantities, is afforded in the fact that several financially strong syndicates are fighting in the courts for gold-bearing claims lying north of Ishpeming. The contesting claimants are respectively Cleveland and Chicago and Pittsburg and Marquette capitalists.

Here we have it at last, straight and reliable. Roscoe Conkling did really talk a few evenings ago about the Republican presidential nominee, saying among other things, "But no, it will not be Sheridan. Nor will it be Judge Gresham. But it'll be Blaine, and if not he, then Sherman, or perhaps Allison. Or maybe it will be that little fellow[dramatically seesawing the air over his right shoulder with the thumb of his right hand] what's his name? I always forget it. I mean Hawley—Joe Hawley."

The differences between Secretary Endicott and Gen. Sheridan have resulted in the formulation of a bill to more closely define the duties of the general of the armies of the United States. As Secretary Endicott sees his duty he has the right to make details, change officers and order bodies of troops hither and thither while the general in command (?) sits in his office and plays clerk for the War Department. This view of things is ridiculous. Caricatured for war times, it places the general in the field ahead of his command (?) with his subordinates taking their orders by telegraph from the Secretary of War.

An extraordinary appeal in behalf of a convict has been sent Gov. Oglesby, of Illinois. The convict is "Joe" Mackin, who was found guilty of being one of the chief conspirators in the Chicago election frauds of 1884. The petition has been signed by the Judge who conducted the trial, the prosecutor, every member of the jury save one, the Mayor, several judges, a United States senator and many prominent citizens. All this is because a confession has been made by one Gallagher which exonerates Mackin. Such a petition is entitled to a great weight, and if the Governor is convinced that Mackin has suffered unjustly he will no doubt come to his relief promptly.

A Marquette special says: Within the past few days the Congressional campaign in this district has become the hottest ever known here. The Republican leaders discovered early in the week that it would be unsafe to rely on the large party majority in this district, as Breen was making considerable headway among the workingmen in some old Republican strongholds. Therefore, the Republicans are now doing heavy work for Seymour. Meetings are being held and great interest has been aroused wherever the labor vote is large. An immense meeting was held at Ishpeming last evening. It was addressed by Senator Babcock who also speaks at Iron Mountain and other points. The Democratic and Labor parties have many speakers in the district and are making a tremendous effort for Breen. It is getting to be a most exciting campaign, but Seymour is sure to be elected by a good majority.

Winter Marine Notes

The frames are up ready for planking on the Stockbridge yacht, at the Campbell ship yard.

The Mackinac Transportation Co will use the steamer Faxton as an excursion boat at St. Ignace during the coming season.

The master and owner of the schooner Hattie Fisher, now on the ways at Washburn's yard, is here to work on the repairs to his vessel.

Capt. Dan Nelson, late of the schooner John Schuette, has been appointed to the command of the steamer Louis Pahlow for the coming season.

Capt. John Penfold, of Frankfort, owner of the tug Campbell, is here looking up timber and material to rebuild his tug. He will give her a thorough overhauling.

B. B. Inman, of Duluth, has purchased the propeller Ossifrage, which run on the Cheboygan and "Soo" route last season, and will take her to Zenith city to run as an excursion boat.

The Sands & Maxwell Lumber Company of Pentwater, are desirous of having built a steamer that will carry 200,000 feet of lumber on a draught of nine feet, and make fourteen miles per hour.

The new ferry steamer St. Ignace is expected to reach the straits by the 25th of March. The front wheel is cast in such shape that it will work to the right or to the left with equal power. It weighs twelve thousand pounds.

St. Ignace Republican: Engineer Walsh, of the Algomah, has gone to Detroit to fit out the mammoth steamer St. Ignace, and M. H. O'Brien, who has been second under Mr. Walsh for a long term of years, has been appointed chief, and Louis Hoppel, of the Faxton, takes the place made vacant by the promotion of Mr. O'Brien.

As a rule, vessels which pulled through the season of 1887 without any serious mishaps, no matter what trade they were engaged in, netted the owners anywhere from 33⅓ to 60 per cent of their valuation, those low in value showing the largest net earnings. Exceptional cases exist no doubt, but they are few.

Milwaukee Wisconsin: The lease of the steamer Wyoming for another season by the Western Transit Company is worthy of special mention, because it indicates that the prospective increase of tonnage on the great lakes has as yet in no wise affected the value of floating property, and also serves to show what handsome returns some people occasionally manage to secure upon their investments in that direction. The Wyoming was built by R. Mills & Co., of Buffalo, for themselves, and made her first appearance last spring as one of the Western Transit Line fleet under a lease of $35,000 for the season, free of all expenses. This lease has now been renewed for the season of 1888, at the same figure and under the same conditions. Thus, in two seasons the owners will have in bank the snug sum of $70,000 as a return on an investment of perhaps a trifle over 100,000; for although the Wyoming is valued in the Inland Lloyd's register at $120,000, no one at all conversant with shipyard work will concede that she cost the builder who own her anywhere near that sum. It is therefore fair to assume that should the Wyoming earn another $35,000 in 1889 she will have fully paid for herself at the end of three seasons, without suffering any marked depreciation in value.

The exercises of the schools on Friday evening were rendered to a crowded house. Enough were present besides parents and children, to give the schools a fund of $7:39 toward their library.

Neighborhood News.

David M. Hunt has been appointed postmaster at Bay Springs.

The Grand Rapids & Indiana, it is reported, will build a line from St. Ignace to the "Soo" in the spring.

The snow prevents the thickening of the ice, and it is not more than an average of 15 inches in thickness about the straits.

Thomas Nelson, late foreman of the Cheboygan Democrat, has accepted an editorial position on the News. Mr. Nelson has held a similar position on the Manistique Sun, and is a journalist of undoubted ability.

The light-house keepers resident of Mackinac are much interested in the efforts of Democratic congressmen to have them removed from the positions they hold. It is hardly possible that the decapitation will be as general as threatened. We think the two honorable (?) gentlemen have bitten off more than they can swallow. The 11th light-house district has a corps of light-house keepers unequalled in the service, many of them veterans of the army or navy. If these men should be removed as threatened, and inexperienced men succeed them, it would be an outrage of civil service rules and result in much disaster and wreckage to lake shipping, beside disgrace to the service.—St. Ignace News.

Instructions Forwarded to the Several Land Offices.

By the recent decision of the Interior Department restoring to the public domain the lands reserved for railroads, immense tracts of land in Michigan are affected, as stated in a recent Washington dispatch. Just how much is restored and is now open for entry cannot yet be ascertained, for the work of ascertaining the localities and tracts is of such magnitude that Chief Clerk Jones, of the Interior Department, who has charge of Michigan's public land interests, says it will take six weeks, and may not be attempted at all except as applications are made for entries. The extent of these "reserved" lands may be understood however, by considering that they cover a belt seventy wide, running the entire length, north and south, of the Lower Peninsula of Michigan. But much of this has been acquired by the railroads, so that the lands now restored and subject to entry are in scattered tracts in almost every county south of the straits.

As the Department is deluged with letters of inquiry as to the situation, Mr. Jones gives the status of the matter thus: The lands were originally granted to the Grand Rapids & Indiana, and the Jackson, Lansing & Saginaw roads, in '61 or '65, as a bonus to encourage the construction of the roads. Each road got an absolute grant of lands covering a wide strip running north and south the length of the peninsula. But at the time of the grant many people had acquired lands within the limit of the railroad grants. In order, therefore, that the roads might choose other public lands to make up for those held by private parties within their limits, the government reserved beds adjoining the absolute grants. This reserve was twenty miles wide on each side of the G. R. & I. grant, or forty miles in all; and fifteen miles on each side of the J., L. & S. grant, or thirty miles in all—a total of seventy miles in width the length of the Lower Peninsula. These lands have remained reserved ever since. Much of them have been taken by the roads in return for those held by private parties on the grants. It is what remains and which has been tied up for twenty years, that is now restored by the Department's decision.

These lands are subject to entry as other public lands, and the method of making application for them is quite clearly defined in recent instructions forwarded to the land offices at Reed City, Saginaw and Detroit, for the restored lands are in all three districts. These instructions say in substance:

"You are instructed to restore to the public domain all lands in your district within the indemnity limit of the grants, except such as may be covered by selections heretofore made by the roads and approved by the department. As to lands covered by unapproved selections of the roads, applications may be received for their entry, subject to the claims of the roads. If application is made showing evidence that lands are not subject to the road's selection, then the road is to be given a hearing on the matter, the register and receiver deciding the matter, subject to appeal by either party.

"The Secretary's order revoked said indemnity withdrawals takes effect from the date of its issue (December 15) so to open the land embraced herein for settlement, but filings or entries of lands will not be received until notice of the restoration shall have been given by advertisement for ninety days."

This last paragraph of instruction shows exactly when applications for entries will be received. The land offices have been instructed to advertise at once, so that this thirty days' notice must now be nearly over. Applications will then be received. The words "indemnity limit," "indemnity withdrawal" and "reserved lands" are all used to mean the same thing.

The counties having parts of the reserved lands along the G. R. & I. road are: Cass, St. Joseph, VanBuren, Kalamazoo, Allegan, Ottawa, Kent, Muskegon, Newaygo, Lake, Manistee, Wexford, Grand Traverse, Leelanaw, Charlevoix, Emmet, Branch, Calhoun, Barry, Ionia, Montcalm, Mecosta, Isabella, Osceola, Clare, Missaukee, Kalkaska, Otsego and Cheboygan. The counties in part covered by the J. L. & S. reserved lands are: Lenawee, Hillsdale, Branch, Jackson, Calhoun, Ingham, Eaton, Shiawassee, Clinton, Saginaw, Gratiot, Tuscola, Bay, Midland, Clare, Gladwin, Roscommon, Ogemaw, Missaukee, Crawford, Kalkaska, Antrim, Otsego, Charlevoix, Cheboygan and Emmet.

The list embraces all counties covered by the "reserved lands," but does not omit such as has been previously acquired by private ownership, or have since been selected by the roads. As to what public lands of the restored domain still remain in these counties can only be ascertained by the applications for future entries when they come to be examined. It is the opinion of Mr. Jones that the aggregate of lands subject to entry by the decision is not very large, and is considerably scattered. Yet, such as it is, it is now in the market for the first speculator who wishes to make the entries.

Say neighbor, don't forget that you can save 25 cents on the $1 during A. T. Washburne & Co.'s ¼ sale.

Some third party organs and leaders speak one word in favor of local option and two against it. This shows how sincere they are for prohibition.

A few more cloaks left to be sold at ¼ price at A. T. Washburne & Co's.

I am likely to be called away again for six weeks or two months and those wishing dental work done, will please call as early as possible.

—The croakers who pooh-pooh at the railroad proceedings should bear in mind that the D. C. & L. R. R. Co. is a corporate body in something more than name. It is not only a legalized corporation under the State law, but it owns a right of way, of which the maps and profiles are filed in the railroad archives of the State. It has the wherewith upon which to operate, even if the present negotiations should fall through. It can secure a loan upon the security of its right of way as easily as hundreds of like corporations have done in times past, and it has in its favor the possession of a route through one of the best portions of Michigan, in the direct pathway between great railroad systems which must in the natural course of events be traversed. But we have reliable assurances that present negotiations are progressing satisfactorily, and that work will be in progress next summer. In any event, the road will be built. There is more than one way to remove the hide from a cat, and the officers of the company have the job well in hand for any emergency that may arise. Take our word for it, the road will be built, and Charlevoix will have its boom. As we have previously remarked, by way of metaphor, there is a hen on.

—Milwaukee Wisconsin: The Detroit, Charlevoix & Escanaba Railroad Company propose to build extensive docks at Charlevoix, with a track yard on one side. —At the regular meeting of the Fire Department held Monday evening, the following officers were elected: President, Will Horton; Vice President, Robert Miller; Secretary, Charles See; Treasurer, Harry Nicholls; Chief, O. —Mancelona Herald: At the time Antrim county voted on the question of local option we thought the matter over carefully from an unprejudiced standpoint, and came to the conclusion that while the law would not altogether stop the sale of intoxicants, yet it would materially lessen the evil, and upon this view we favored the measure. Time, of course, will demonstrate the failure or success of the law, but, from the manner in which the opponents of temperance in some parts of the state are working to get around the law without laying themselves liable to prosecution, it certainly looks as though liquor will obtained without difficulty and at the same time without violating the provisions of the act.

THE NATIONAL BANK.

Its Organization Effected and Officers Elected.

At a meeting held one evening last week the following gentlemen came to the surface as stockholders of the National Bank: W. P. Brown, W. A. Brown, G. R. Brown, G. W. Crouter, G. V. Nash, R. W. Kane, A. D. Cruikshank, J. L. Hurd, Byron See, L. D. Bartholomew, Wm. M. Gow and Dr. Campbell Fair.

The meeting proceeded with the election of officers with the following result: President, W. P. Brown; Vice President, G. W. Crouter; Cashier, W. A. Brown.

The Board of Directors starts off as follows: W. P. Brown, W. A. Brown, G. W. Crouter, Byron See, R. W. Kane, J. L. Hurd and L. D. Bartholomew.

The enterprise has reached that point where it may safely be reckoned a certainty, although considerable yet remains to be done before the machinery can be set in motion.

But if everything moves as it is expected to, in about 60 days we may all have a pocket-full of crisp new $20 bills of the "First National Bank of Charlevoix"—providing, of course, our bank account is big enough.

The Eleventh District Election.

The returns show the election of Seymour for Congress in the Eleventh District by only about 500 majority. Breen expresses his determination to contest.

Teachers' Reading Circle.

The Teachers' Reading Circle held its regular monthly meeting at the Library rooms last Wednesday evening with a full attendance. Synopses of the work done in each study during the month were given as follows: Political History of Egypt, by Mrs. Upright; Egyptian Civilization, Manners and Costumes, by Miss Gray; Biographical sketch of D. P. Page, Miss Nelson; Spirit of the Teacher, Miss O'Neill; Fitness for Teaching, Miss Mason; Responsibility of the Teacher, J. M. Harris; Outline of Study in Literature, H. M. Enos. Discussions followed on the Theory and Practice of Teaching as suggested by the foregoing topics. The regular studies pursued by the members of the circle are General History, English Literature, and Page's Theory and Practice of Teaching. Each member presents a discussion of some of the topics included in the current month's work. Next meeting Monday evening, March 12th.

A Card.

None of us are exempt from the infirmities incident to nature, and when overtaken by any of the many calamities by which we are environed there are none of us but whom deeply appreciate the friendly grasp of the hand, the sympathetic word and the kindly act. During our recent affliction and final sad bereavement we were the recipients of so many acts of sympathetic kindness as to overwhelm us with a sense of our obligation to the many who so kindly ministered to the wants of the patient sufferer during her last hours, and finally placed such lovely floral tokens of respect on the casket of her whose feet had been ever swift to the bedside of the suffering, and whose hands were ever ready to bathe the fevered brow. Comrades of the G. A. R., the touch of elbows in days long past gave confidence and courage. That same touch to-day inspires us to bear up under our misfortunes. The Sons of Veterans, who paid such marks of respect, and the friends who sent kind words of sympathy, to one and all we acknowledge our obligation and gratitude, and tender our heartfelt thanks.

Union War Songs and Rebels.

A DAY or two after Lee's surrender in April, 1865, writes a contributor to the Century, I left our ship at "Dutch Gap," in the James river, for a run to Richmond, where I was joined by the ship's surgeon, the paymaster, and one of the junior officers. After "doing" Richmond pretty thoroughly we went in the evening to my room for dinner. Dinner being over and the events of the day recounted, the doctor, who was a fine player, opened the piano, saying: "Boys, we've got our old quartet here; let's have a sing." As the house opposite was occupied by paroled Confederate officers, no patriotic songs were sung. Soon the lady of the house handed me this note:

"Compliments of General —— and staff. Will the gentlemen kindly allow us to come over and hear them sing?" Of course we consented, and they came. As the General entered the room I recognized instantly the face and figure of one who stood second only to Lee or Jackson, in the whole Confederacy. After introductions and the usual interchange of civilities, we sang for them glees and college songs, until at last the General said: "Excuse me, gentlemen, you sing delightfully, but what we want to hear is your army songs." Then we gave them the army songs with unction, the "Battle Hymn of the ...

some of them, come out from affluent homes, choosing teaching as a useful profession; others, finding that father is older than he used to be, and that ...'s eyesight and strength are not as good as once, go to teaching to lighten his load. But I tell you the history of the majority of the female teachers in the public schools when I say, "Father is dead." After the estate was settled the family, that were comfortable before, are thrown on their own resources.

It is hard for men to earn a living in this day, but it is harder for women: their health not so rugged, their arms not so strong, their opportunities fewer. These persons, after tremblingly going through the ordeal of an examination as to their qualifications to teach, half bewildered step over the sill of the public school to do two things—instruct the young and earn their own bread. Her work is wearing to the last degree. The management of forty or fifty fidgety and intractable children, the suppression of their vices, and the development of their excellencies, the management of rewards and punishments, the sending of so many bars of soap and fine tooth combs on benignant ministry, the breaking of so many wild colts for the harness of life, sends her home at night weary, neuralgic, unstrung; so that of all the weary people in your cities for five nights of the week there are none more weary than the public school-teachers. Now, for God's sake, give them a fair chance. Throw no obstacles in the way. If they come out ahead in the race, cheer them. If you want to smite any, smite the male teachers; they can take up the cudgels for themselves. But keep your hands off of defenseless women. Father may be dead, but there are enough brothers left to dare and ... see that they get justice.

Within a stone's throw of this building there died ... years ago one of the principals of our public schools. She had been twenty-five years at that post. She had left the touch of refinement on a multitude of the young. She had, out of her slender purse, given literally thousands of dollars for the destitute who came under her observation as a school-teacher. A deceased sister's children ...

rious and divinely called women who will not be understood till after they are dead, women like Susan B. Anthony, who are giving their life for the betterment of the condition of their sex. Those of you who think that women have under the law of this country an equal chance with men are ignorant of the laws. A gentleman writes me from Maryland, saying: "Take the laws of this State. A man and wife start out in life full of hope in every respect by their joint efforts, and, as is frequently the case, through the economic ideas of the wife, succeed in accumulating a fortune, but they have no children; they reach old age together, and then the husband dies. What does the law of this State do then? It says to the widow, hands off your late husband's property, do not touch it; the State will find others to whom it will give that, but you, the widow, must not touch it, only so much as will keep life within your aged body, that you may live to see those others enjoy what rightfully should be your own." And the State seeks the relatives of the deceased husband, whether they be near or far, whether they were ever heard of before or not, and transfers to them, singly or collectively, the estate of the deceased husband and living widow.

Now, that is a specimen of unjust laws in all the States concerning womanhood. Instead of dying off to the discussion as to whether or not the giving of the right of voting to women will correct these laws, let me say to men, be gallant enough, and fair enough, and honest enough, and righteous enough, and God loving enough to correct these wrongs against women by your own masculine votes. Do not wait for woman suffrage to come, if it ever does come, but so far as you can touch ballot boxes, and legislatures, and congresses begin the reformation. But until justice is done to your sex by the laws of all the States, and women of America take the platforms and the pulpits, and no honorable man will charge Vashti with having lost her veil.

Again, I want you this morning to consider Vashti the sacrifice. Who is this that I see coming out of that palace gate of Shushan? It seems to me that I have seen her before. She comes homeless, houseless, friendless, trudging along with a ...

blind their anticipations they actually hissed it. The mightiest influences to-day are like the planetary system—completely silent. Don't hiss the sun!

Oh, woman! does not this story of Vashti the Queen, Vashti the veiled, Vashti the sacrifice, Vashti the silent, move your soul? My sermon converges into the one absorbing hope that none of you may be shut out of the palace gate of Heaven. You can endure the hardships, and the privations, and the cruelties, and the misfortunes of this life if you only gain admission there. Through the blood of the everlasting covenant, you go through those gates or never go at all.

When Rome was besieged the daughter of its ruler saw the golden bracelets on the left arms of the enemy, and she sent word to them that she would betray her city and surrender it to them if they would only give her those bracelets on their left arms. They accepted the proffer, and by night the daughter of the ruler of the city opened one of the gates. The army entered, and keeping their promise, threw upon her their bracelets, and also their shields, until under weight she died. Alas, that all through the ages the same folly has been repeated, and for the trinkets and glittering treasures of this world, men and women are ... open the portals of their immortal soul for an everlasting surrender, and die under the shining subjugation.

Through the rich grace of our Lord Jesus Christ may you be enabled to imitate the example of Rachel, and Hannah, and Abigail, and Deborah, and Mary, and Vashti. Amen!

Patrick Henry's Death.

In an age when it was fashionable to avow sceptical sentiments, Patrick Henry was always ready to defend the Christian faith. A member of the Episcopal Church, according to his latest biographer, Prof. Tyler, he not infrequently received the communion. On such occasion his habit was to fast until he had been at the Lord's table, and then spend the day in retirement.

One hour, at the close of the day, he spent in private prayer and meditation, ...

THE ROMANCE OF A RING.

An Engagement Almost Broken by a Young Woman's Gambling Craze.

[Pittsburgh Dispatch.]

A pawnbroker sat in the rear room and mused. Nobody could blame him for thus idling his time away, for it was Sunday, and there was absolutely nothing for the poor man to do but sit and muse. He had been to church in the morning. He expected to go again in the evening, so the weight of sins unatoned did not press heavily on his soul. On the contrary, he was light-hearted and happy. So much so that when a reporter wandered into his cozy quarters the general self-satisfied expression on his countenance spread into a smile of hearty welcome.

"I'm glad you don't want me to advance you anything on your overcoat," said he, "because I never do business on Sunday. I guess I can tell you something about the trade, though, if that's all you want. People usually think that our business is briskest in dull times. That's a mighty mistaken idea, and I'll tell you why. When a person pawns anything he generally expects to redeem it at some future time, and if he is not employed he does not like to run the risk of forfeiting his goods. Upon the contrary, if he is making a good salary he is very apt to live a trifle higher than he ought. It is these that go to the pawnbroker for help. Our principal pawning days are Mondays, and Saturdays we are kept busy redeeming. Every pawnbroker has a number of regular customers, who early in the week bring a watch or ring or some other valuable article around and raise a little cash on it. Friday or Saturday the article is redeemed, and the next week the operation is repeated.

negotiations might be accounted for if it were found that the proverbial ill-luck of Sundays, Tuesdays, and Saturdays had not been duly considered, or that proper attention was not paid to the seven evil days in every lunar month, or to the unlucky character of the month of Safer, the second month in the Arabic calendar.—St. James Gazette.

Bob Burdette on Insomnia.

What pleases me, when I am tormented with sleeplessness, is a little health book of my own, in which I have jotted down a few—a very few—of the "infallible remedies" for sleeplessness which had been tried in thousands—or perhaps it was millions—of cases, most of which were in the prescriber's own immediate family, or, at the farthest, circle of intimate friends, and had never once failed to effect a permanent and, it is needless to say, instant cure. All of these cases collectively and each one by itself individually, were, and was exactly like my own in cause, duration, and operation. The simplicity of the combined remedy appeals at once to human confidence.

Eat nothing within three hours before retiring.

Eat a light but substantial luncheon just before going to bed. Nature abhors a vacuum. (This is one of the prescriptions I like.)

Read light literature before going to bed.

Read nothing after supper. Walk a mile in the open air just before bedtime.

Go to your room an hour before retiring, and read until bed-time. Give up smoking all together.

If you are a smoker, a cigar just before retiring will soothe and tranquilize your nerves ...

GHOSTS AT SEA.

In the seventeenth century a ship was about to sail from Salem, Mass., for England. Her cargo was under hatches, her sails bent and her passengers aboard, when two strangers came to her and engaged passage. The couple were a young man and woman who, so tradition says, were endowed with wonderful beauty. Who they were or from whence they came none of the good folk of Salem knew. Long before the ship sailed, she being detained by adverse winds, the mysterious actions of the strange couple had aroused the suspicions of the townspeople, and there were many who pronounced them witches, if, indeed, they were not demons—actual children of Satan in fleshy guise. Many even went so far as to prophesy disaster to the vessel if they should sail in her, and approached the captain and urged him to decline to carry them to sea. The bluff seaman refused to listen, and, the wind serving, the vessel sailed upon a Friday. She never reached her destination and was never spoken. It is told, however, that later in the year incoming vessels, fishermen, and coastwise traders reported sighting a craft with luminous rigging and sails and shining hull and spars. She was sailing with all canvas against the wind, with a crew of dead seamen standing in the shrouds and leaning over the rail, while upon the quarter deck stood a young and beautiful couple.

Old whalemen as they sat spinning yarns about the stove at the ship chandler's tell of meeting in the Japan Sea or Indian Ocean a small, lumpy ship, managed by a crew of graybeards—the sail tattered and patched, and the running rigging spliced in a hundred ...

WEAK AND NERVOUS WOMEN.

How Strength of Nerves and Health of Body May Easily Be Obtained.

Women are great sufferers from nervousness, weakness, nervous prostration, and exhaustion. They droop and languish under household cares and work which never ends. They retire tired and wake tired and unrefreshed; they are worn out and exhausted in nerve and vital power, and have no strength or energy.

Fortunately—and it would almost seem a dispensation of Divine Providence to overworked humanity—there are medicines which restore lost nerve forces, rebuild the weakened system and re-establish health, strength and energy. These medicines, which are purely vegetable, have been combined into a wonderful remedy known as Dr. Greene's Nervura Nerve Tonic, which is kept by all druggists at $1 per bottle. This truly wonderful remedy is without doubt the greatest discovery of the century, and is the best strengthening and invigorating remedy ever known.

For nervous and physical exhaustion, weak, tired and languid feelings, with no power or ambition for exertion, it is a sovereign remedy and absolutely certain cure. In cases of sleeplessness and nervous irritability its use will be followed by calm repose and natural, refreshing sleep. For nervousness, nervous debility, exhausted vitality, despondency and depression of the mind it is a perfect specific. For malaria, neuralgia, rheumatism, paralysis, numbness, trembling and insanity it is the only positive and recognized remedy. It never fails to cure nervous and sick headache, weakness and pain in the back and side, palpitation of the heart, apoplexy, epileptic fits, hysteria, St. Vitus' dance, dyspepsia, indigestion, loss of appetite, constipation, biliousness, kidney and liver diseases.

Other medicines may be offered by druggists, but do not be persuaded to try uncertainties, when by the use of this wonderful remedy you can certainly be cured. Should your druggist not have Dr. Greene's Nervura Nerve Tonic, he will get it for you if you insist upon having it. Dr. Greene, its discoverer, is the great specialist in the cure of nervous and chronic diseases, and he may be consulted by those using this remedy, or by any sufferer from disease, free of charge, at his office, 35 West 14th st., New York, personally or by letter.

W[illegible]LARD A. [illegible]

CHARLEVOIX, FEB. 22, 1888.

Gen. Cutcheon's Views.

Gen. Cutcheon, Representative in Congress, from this (Ninth) District, was recently interviewed and expressed himself as follows, on the tariff question.

"The tariff bill which has been prepared, and which is known as the administration bill, was made up by Speaker Carlisle and Secretary Fairchild. It goes in for a general reduction of the revenue by removing the tariff from all new materials, such as iron, lumber, copper, salt, fish, wool, etc. It attacks the protection system not as a whole, but piecemeal and at its most vulnerable point. Hence the republicans and the protective democrats will have to be on the alert unless they want to see protection shattered. The tariff reformers are not going to make an open or vigorous stand; they are too sharp not to see that a dissatisfaction in their own ranks would blight all hopes of 1888, and so they have decided to take what they can get and not insist on any radical change which would be unsatisfactory to Randall and his followers. They will be willing to make many a concession, and yet when the tinkering is all over will have scored a victory unless some decisive steps are taken by the republicans to check them.

"To my mind the protective tariff system must either be a good thing or a bad thing. If good, then why not stand by it as a system? Why permit it to be attacked here and there? But let the enemy once get beyond your picket fences and you will soon find him taking possession of your camp. Either protection is right and free trade wrong, or free trade is right and protection wrong. They are totally different principles and won't mix. Take my own state of Michigan for instance. A removal of the tariff on raw materials would do our people an incalculable injury. Our chief industries are maintained by the very articles the free traders would strike at. As a state we stand first in the production of iron, lumber, salt and copper, and fourth in the production of wool. Indeed, in copper we have a monopoly, and yet they would place all these articles on the free list. "What would be the result?" "Why the result would be that Michigan manufacturers would simply cross the border into Canada, where labor is 20 per cent. cheaper than in our State, and conduct their business there. The whole scheme of the alleged reformers is to break down the tariff by striking at its points which are objectionable principally to the prairie or border states. They would be greatly benefited by taking off the tariff from lumber, but we'll fight any attempt in this direction to the bitter end."

Gen. Cutcheon thinks that Blaine will certainly be nominated for the presidency, and he believes that ex-Gov. Alger will have the support of the Michigan delegates in the convention for the vice-presidency.

Representative Timothy E. Tarsney of Michigan, is lying very ill at Providence Hospital in Washington While his physicians do not say that he is dangerous, he is known to be so ill that his close friends are not allowed to see him. Mr. Tarsney is suffering from nervous prostration. His brother-in-law and law partner went from Saginaw, but when he called at the hospital he was not allowed to see the patient. Michigan members are very anxious about the condition of their colleague, and regard him as a very sick man.

D. R. Locke, editor of the Toledo Blade, widely known as "Petroleum V. Nasby," died last week. The immediate cause of his death was consumption of the lungs. The consumption was inherited, being in his mother's family, and several brothers and sisters dying of it. Its approach was very slow, and it was not till last November that he was confined to the house. His fortune was estimated at a million exclusive of the Blade. A wife and three sons survive him.

Apparently nothing can be done to prevent the abolition of the land offices at Detroit, Saginaw and Reed City, and the establishment of the new office at Grayling, as the official order to that effect has been signed by Secretary Vilas and mailed to the officials interested. As soon as the proper legal notice has been given the new order of things will go in force.

Milwaukee Sentinel: The English free trader differs in no respect whatever from the American tariff reformer. The principles and aims of the two are identical—a tariff for revenue only. A free trader, therefore, is one who is opposed to a tariff for protection and favors a tariff for revenue only.

W. T. [illegible] of East Jordan has [illegible] [illegible] township, died recently at her home.

A Roman Catholic church parsonage and school are to be built at Elk Rapids.

Robert Pautz, of Frankfort, has drawn a $15,000 prize in the New Orleans lottery.

Dr. Bennett, of East Jordan, has been obliged, on account of his health, to take a trip South.

A force of men are at work upon the landing place at Mackinac City for the new Straits of Mackinaw ferry boat.

Frankfort confidently expects to have before another winter, possibly two, and certainly one bran new railroad.

There is great excitement at Petoskey over the discovery of natural gas. A company has been formed to sink a well 2,000 feet deep.

Hon. Perry Hannah is writing interesting and valuable letters from the Pacific slope for publication in the Grand Traverse Herald.

The Deputy Game Warden of Antrim county recently arrested his son-in-law, at Central Lake, for killing ducks, and had him fined $5.

Hon. Henry W. Seymour, the new Congressman in the Eleventh district, is a nephew of the late Gov. Seymour, of New York, and a cousin of Roscoe Conkling.

The Frankfort Lumber Co., of South Frankfort, doing the largest business in that locality, has temporarily suspended. Liabilities and assets unknown.

The Lehigh Valley Line has made an alliance with the "Soo" road, and will build two steel cruisers to ply between Buffalo and Gladstone, Mich. these will carry coal westward and flour eastward.

The local assembly Knights of Labor at East Jordan held a local option meeting last week which was addressed in a powerful speech by Will Norton, of Boyne City, that accounts for the big Prohibition vote there.

The Martel furnace, at St. Ignace, was banked last week to remain closed until the new ferry St. Ignace arrives, or navigation opens, so that its product of iron can be shipped. The output since May 1st has been 11,700 tons.

A Mancelona man who went to Washington Territory, writes back advising all who contemplate moving there to stay away, as there are ten applicants for every job, and the mud is as deep as the snow ever gets to be in Antrim county.

A. P. Swineford says that notwithstanding that the people elected Henry W. Seymour, Bartley Breen will succeed the late Seth C. Moffatt in Congress—that Breen will contest the election, and the Democratic majority in Congress will seat him in spite of the vote.

A Cadillac grocer won a bet from a butcher a few days ago by eating at one sitting twenty-six fried eggs, three large slices of bread and drinking two cups of coffee. One item of the bill of fare for breakfast next morning was a quart of milk.

Kalkaska Leader: Two letters from Kalkaska people who are in California, a paper from C. S. White, who is in North Carolina, and a verbal account from Alf. G. Drake, of his recent Southern trip, does not in the least weaken our allegiance to Northern Michigan.

Elmer Cummer, aged 24, younger son of Hon. Jacob Cummer, was killed at Cadillac one day last week. The deceased was assistant superintendent for his father in the Cummer Lumber Co.'s extensive lumbering operations, and was out with a logging train, when by some means he was caught in the gearing of the locomotive and was killed. The deceased leaves a young wife.

Congressman Chipman recently introduced a bill in the House providing for range lights and fog bells on the upper lakes. Among the sums appropriated by the bill are $5,500 for a fog signal at Beaver Island, $5,500 for a fog signal at Mackinac Point, $25,000 for the removal of the lighthouse at McGulpin's Point to Old Mackinaw point, and $5,500 for a fog signal at the Cheboygan light house.

Lelanaw Enterprise: W. S. Johnson, of Sutton's Bay, is in luck. For some time he has held a large quantity of stock in the Belmont, an undeveloped iron mine in the upper peninsula. Recently he received a telegram from the president of the company that ore has been found, and he has gone there to investigate it. On the adjoining eighty acres to the one on which the Belmont is situated is one of the richest iron mines of the Gogebic range, and this will probably prove a rich mine.

Kalkaskian: Rev. J. F. McKinley had a son in the regular army who four years ago was led into an ambush, with a party of soldiers, which was surrounded by [illegible] [illegible] to report [illegible] [illegible] fact that [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] last Friday [illegible] surprise, he received a letter from him, dated Salt Lake City, where he is safe and sound, and in prosperous circumstances.

Cadillac News and Express: One hundred and twenty-one thousand loaves of baker's bread were sold by the bakers of our city during the year 1887, and as several newly married persons have commenced housekeeping, and others are making arrangements to do likewise, the bakers are confidently expecting a good increase of trade for the present year. Four thousand and two hundred beeves were retailed through the butcher shops of Cadillac during the past year, the greater part of it being tenderloin steaks and choice roasting pieces.

Early announcements are already out for the next Bay View season, which will rival all former ones in magnificence, and cause that peerless summer resort to be more thronged than ever. All winter they have been building cottages there, and from seventy-five to one hundred new ones will be put up before July. A fine new building for the summer school for teachers will be built, the great auditorium and all the hotels enlarged, and many ornamental improvements made on the already beautiful grounds. The assembly, with its nine departments, will this year last three weeks, and much of the finest educational, musical, platform and entertaining talent in the land has been engaged.

Harbor Springs Independent: Charlevoix shingle men are hauling their shingles to Petoskey and shipping from here by rail. We are glad to see them come, but are liberal enough to hope they will have a railroad of their own next winter.—The firm of McOmber, Smith & Co. has been dissolved by mutual consent, Mr. Smith and Mr. Pepper retiring, and Mr. McOmber continuing the business. — One of Petoskey's most valued industries is the pulp factory, and every citizen will be glad to know that Mr. Birkett has to keep the mill running night and day this winter. He has brought over fifty car-loads of pulp wood to Petoskey since December, and has sent away half as many car-loads of pulp. It is doubtful if any twenty thousand dollar plant in Northern Michigan is as much benefit to the country. The three run of grinders consume hundreds of cords of wood each year, and Mr. Birkett pays big prices for the wood.—Last week the representatives of a Jackson monument company set up a beautiful monument to the memory of L. W. Cole and his son Fred, lost in the Coral disaster. It is a handsome capped shaft of Scotch Granite, eight feet high and three and a half feet square at the base. The base bears the name "Cole," while the face is inscribed with the epitaph of the father, and a Maltese cross, the emblem of the Knights Templar, and one side bears the name and age of the son.

Petoskey Record: Rev. John E. Robinson, who has been assisting the pastor of the M. E. church at Alba in a revival for several weeks past is at home again. Bro. Robinson reports 28 accessions, and on Sunday week he baptized 13 adults and 2 children among the fruits of the revival.—Mr. J. I. Atkins has a good farm of 80 acres between Charlevoix and Ironton, on the shore of Pine Lake, with good soil, 30 acres improved, 100 apple trees, good barn and out buildings, log house, fine bed of clay on premises suitable for making brick and tile, which he wants to sell or trade for Petoskey property, or a vessel.—Last week for several days steam or vapor was noticed rising apparently from the sidewalk in front of McConnell's house on Howard street hill, nearly opposite the Cruiler house, and on climbing over the huge snow drift that covered the walk, a hole of eighteen inches across and about four feet deep was discovered between the yard fence and sidewalk, from which a current warmer than the surrounding air seemed to ascend. As soon as the fact was reported down town there was much excitement. On Saturday all the solid men of Petoskey visited that hole. On foot, in cutters, on bob-sleighs, the bankers, merchants, speculators, real estate owners, and village dignitaries, visited the place, and each man as he arrived knelt down, stuck his head and shoulders as far down the hole as possible and snuffed for a smell of gas. Indeed, looking up the hill from "down town," the wrong end of some prominent citizen was to be seen looming up against the back ground of snow all day long. On Monday Wm. L. Curtis sent a man to dig, and it was found that while the ground around the spot was frozen solid, a space 18 inches across was without a particle of frost in the earth. Nothing further has been done, and the cause of the phenomena is as yet a mystery.

How Nero Died.

As there are degrees of quality in a man, so there are in an animal. There are good, bad and indifferent men, and the same can be said of dogs. One of the noblest dogs we ever met died last night. We owned him five years and we knew him thoroughly. So did the children of the neighborhood, who climbed on and tumbled over his massive form. So did the newsboys, who found him almost daily at the office, and they rarely passed him without giving him a patting, if not a hugging. The fact that he was a bloodhood, and of remarkable size, made some people strangers to his disposition timid with him. But there was nothing to justify the fear. He was the essence of gentleness, and children, who are the first to know their friends, instinctively recognized this. He never growled at them. He never even frowned upon them. When they became too demonstrative he immediately withdrew from their society. Nero left the office for home last evening in good spirits. After supper and a drink he manifested a desire to go to bed. As he was getting quite blind a light was used to show him the way. This morning at daylight he was found outside his bed, lying on the floor, quietly sleeping to all appearances. But he was dead. They say he died of heart disease. But death came to him as we like to have it come to all of gentle nature—without uproar.—Danbury (Conn.) News.

Artificial Light.

Mr. Richard J. Monks, the treasurer of the South Boston Gas-Light company, gave the following statistics in a recent lecture before the Beacon society of Boston.

"The use of whale oil originated with the Norwegians. In 1680 the Dutch had two hundred vessels, employing fourteen thousand men, in the business. In New England the whales were first caught from small boats. The Indians engaged with avidity in the hunt for whales. In 1858 there were six hundred vessels of 200,000 tons burden engaged in the American whale fishery. The argand lamp was first used in 1800. Candles were spoken of first in a remote period. Their use really began in the early history of Christianity. As late as the sixteenth century their use was limited. In spite of modern methods, the candle is used for certain purposes, and the soft light cannot fail to please the eye. The honor and merit of the first application of coal gas seems to belong to William Murdoch, of Redworth, Cornwall. In 1802 he lighted an extensive manufacturing establishment. France also claimed the honor of its first demonstration, but not satisfactorily. Jan. 18, 1807, saw a number of London streets lighted by gas. The amount of £20,000 was raised, and the king was petitioned for the incorporation of a company. Two companies supply London at 70 cents per one thousand cubic feet, and their capital is $66,000,000. Coal gas was first used in Baltimore in 1816, and for some time its progress was slow and unsatisfactory. Now there are over one thousand works in the United States, furnishing employment to over twenty-five thousand men, a portion being used for the manufacture of water gas.

"In 1808 a Frenchman discovered the process by which water gas was made. In 1875 Prof. Lowe established the first works in the United States. The business has increased enormously here, but not always, because hard coal and naphtha are so expensive. Natural gas has been known and extensively used in Asia and China for a long time. History tells us of a well in France in the time of Julius Cæsar. The first in the United States was in Charleston. The Taylor house, in Fredonia, N. Y., was illuminated in 1824 in honor of Lafayette. A few years ago a gas well was discovered in Ocean Spray, near this city (Boston). The nature and efficiency of natural gas is but partly understood.

"Petroleum was known to mankind from the dawn of history. It was spoken of in Sweden in 1750. In western Pennsylvania it was found on the ground and used as a medicine many years before wells were bored. In 1858 a well 72 feet deep yielded more than 1,000 barrels a day. Then a reckless spirit of speculation arose. It enriched a few, while it ruined thousands. The standard drill is five and one-half inches, the flow being as great from a small as from a large hole. In 1880 the production amounted to 25,000,000 barrels, and the stock on hand June 1, 1880, was valued at $11,000,000. Russia has valuable deposits in Baku, long known, but just put to commercial use. The value of exports thence in 1883 was $15,000,000. In Russia they are ahead of America in being able to use the residuum or petroleum. So abundant is the oil in Baku, that work can be carried on by its flame in the night, and the oozing of the oil from the ground prevents dust."

Stabbing A New Yorker.

A [illegible] writes to the Providence Journal about a New York merchant [illegible]

This gentleman came to Boston to introduce a new line of goods which he was anxious to have come into use here, and said to a Boston acquaintance that if he could help him in obtaining any orders he should receive a commission of [illegible] per cent. and be doing a favor as well. The Bostonian interested himself in the matter, and finding a chance for the placing of the goods, took the New Yorker to a well known business house where he was well acquainted, introduced him and spoke well of his goods. The result was that the firm visited gave him a small trial order, promising, should the goods prove satisfactory, to follow this with a substantial purchase.

The manufacturer was delighted to have opened negotiations with this firm, and expressed his gratitude volubly. He made no further allusion to the commission, but the Bostonian supposed this to be because he was waiting until the full order came in. Nearly a year passed, however, and although the Bostonian learned that the house to which he had given an introduction was purchasing the books largely, he had no further communication from New York. At length he took the initiative by writing to inquire where his commission of [illegible] per cent. was. The answer received in closed a check for commission on the trial purchase of samples, the amount being $1.18.

"And do you suppose," the Boston man said, telling the story, "that I drew the check? Oh, no; I keep it carefully, and every month there is a discrepancy of $1.18 between his check book and his bank account, and it reminds him of the mean thing he has done. I stab him every month; don't you see?"

The Orator Sat Down.

Gen. George A. Sheridan of Louisiana tells another story on himself. In the old days of carpet-baggers he was paying his respects to William Pitt Kellogg before a crowded audience in New Orleans. Sheridan exhausted his store of invective in dealing with his subject, and allowed his eloquence to mount to this: "If every drop of water in that mighty Mississippi, whose source is in the snows of the far Northwest, were a sparkling diamond, and every diamond mine, I would not stand in William Pitt Kellogg's shoes. If every grain of sand along its banks transmuted into gold and the whole glittering pile strewn at my feet, mine own, I would not be in his place." The Chairman quietly tugged his coat tail at this point and whispered: "Sheridan, sit down; you know you lie!" The orator sat down.

On another occasion he was introduced to an audience in Central Illinois by a bucolic Chairman, who said: "We will now be addressed by a gentleman whose name is a familiar word from Maine to the Missouri River. He is one of the shiny chieftains of our grand old party. He has spoken to countless thousands, and his eloquence has spurred hosts on to victory. He will speak to us in that same strain. I now introduce Mr. —— Mr. ——" and then turning to Sheridan he hoarsely whispered: "I'm blanked if I haven't forgotten your name."—Boston Advertiser.

How to Use an Umbrella.

"The proper way to open an umbrella without damaging it," McElwee, the dealer in sunshades and the like, remarked to a tourist to-day, "is to loosen the folds by means of a quick shaking of the right hand, in which the umbrella should be held by the handle. Then press the fastening with the thumb of the left hand, and you will find that the umbrella opens without hindrance at any point. Many fine silk umbrellas are damaged and frequently ruined by carelessness on the part of the owner. You frequently see the band that holds the folds in place unfastened by a tug at the end which projects beyond the button. In order to render the band and button more serviceable, the band should be pulled gently as if to tighten it about the handle. This will permit the button to pass through the opening without the necessity of half-wrenching it from the band by a fierce tug. Then the umbrella-smasher clutches the handle in one hand, and without loosening the folds, which may be damp, he presses the fastening with his thumb and is surprised that the umbrella does not yield to the pressure. Then he pushes at the fastening until something gives way. Perhaps the umbrella will open, and perhaps one of the ribs has been weakened and forced through the covering.

In order to fold an umbrella neatly hold the handle in the right hand in such a way as to keep the ends of the ribs pressed close to the handle between the forefinger and the thumb, as you turn the handle dexterously by elevating the wrist, your hand, of course, being palm downward on the handle. But the neatness of the fold depends equally upon the service of the left hand. With the left you grasp the tether end of the umbrella, palm upward, and as you turn with the right use the left to gather and hold the folds securely, as you move it along carefully until it strikes the band. Hold the band with the left and fasten it with the right. If the folding has been done properly the band can be placed over the button without tugging at the end of the band with all your might."—Albany Journal.

Making Improvements.

A Detroit drummer has often stopped with an old farmer near a country store, getting supper, lodging, and breakfast, for which he was charged 75 cents. On his last trip he was surprised when he asked the amount of his bill to be told that it was $2. He remonstrated with the farmer and wanted to know why his bill was larger than common. "Wall," said the landlord, "I hev been makin' some improvements."

"But I had the same bed and the meals were no better," replied the commercial man. "What improvements have you made?"

"Jest step out here an' I will show you," replied mine host and he led the guest out on the porch and pointed to a sign reading, "Hotel."—Detroit Free Press.

"I'm thinking of building me a house," said Jones to Smith last evening. "Good idea," said Smith; "how much money have you?" "About $3,000." "Three thousand dollars; well that will build a very neat $2,200 house with economy." P. S. If you have ever built a house you will see the point.—Nashville American.

MURDERED AT HOME.

Amos J. Snell, a Chicago Millionaire, Shot Down in His Own House by Burglars.

A CHICAGO dispatch says that "Amos J. Snell, the millionaire real-estate man, was murdered by unknown burglars in the parlor-floor hallway of his residence at No. 425 Washington boulevard, about 2 o'clock Wednesday morning. He was shot dead with scarcely a moment's warning while battling fearlessly in defense of his life, his home, and his property against midnight robbers and assassins. The shocking and bloody tragedy created a profound sensation, not only in the immediate neighborhood where it occurred, but throughout the entire city. The atrocity of the crime has seldom been paralleled, and the abruptness with which the news of its perpetration was flashed from house to house, and from shop to shop, caused men, women, and children to shiver involuntarily at the thought of their unprotection from such deeds of violence. There is no clew to the perpetrators of the murder, and it is feared they will never be brought to justice. A. J. Snell, the murdered man, was the largest land-holder in Cook County. He was the owner of 360 marble-front houses in Chicago, and was worth at least $3,000,000.

POSTAL SERVICE.

Wonderful Growth of the Postoffice Business.

A BILL has been introduced and favorably reported by the House Committee on Postoffices to provide for a Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, says a Washington dispatch. The investigation which preceded the reporting of this bill furnishes a very interesting exhibit of the growth of the country since 1836, when a similar bill to relieve the First Assistant Postmaster General was passed by creating the office of Third Assistant Postmaster General. In that period the number of postoffices has increased from 11,100 to 55,000; the extent of post routes from 118,264 miles to 474,142 miles; the revenue of the department from $1,408,423 to $48,837,609; the expenditure of the department from $1,841,765 to $53,006,194; the amount of salaries to Postmasters from $812,803 to $11,929,481; the amount paid for transportation of mails from $1,638,052 to $22,867,708.

A Fighting Editor Meets His Match.

A BIRMINGHAM (Ala.) special says: Tom Ellis, editor of the Hornet, who was shot by Detective Sullivan, is dead. How he lived so long after being shot is a mystery even to physicians. His pulse ceased to beat thirteen hours before he died, and three hours before he stopped breathing his limbs were cold and rigid. Internal hemorrhage was the immediate cause of death. Ellis was editor of the Hornet, a weekly paper which has very generally been considered a disgrace to Birmingham. He made a bitter personal attack on Detective Sullivan. The two met in a saloon, drew pistols simultaneously, and "fought to a finish."

Millions in Gold at Stake.

AN Ishpeming (Mich.) dispatch says "a lawsuit, with millions on each side, over what promises to prove a valuable gold property, is pending. The property is a forty-acre tract near Ishpeming, adjoining the Lake Shore Superior Company's find, where quartz assaying $40,000 to the ton was discovered last summer. The Michigan Gold Company, formed by Cleveland and Chicago men, dispossessed by force the Pittsburg and Marquette syndicate, claiming the property, and have since had a large force of men at work."

THE bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to omit all duties upon importations of animals for breeding purposes, whether imported for the importer's own use or for sale, passed the Senate on the 8th inst. It provides that the fact of such importation shall be a sufficient defense in any pending action. Messrs. Stewart and Mitchell advocated the passage of the bill allowing the sale of certain mineral lands to aliens. The House of Representatives passed the bill making bills of lading conclusive evidence in certain cases. It provides that whenever any common carrier or its agent signs and delivers any bill of lading, purporting to be for merchandise received by such carrier for transportation from one State to another within the United States or to any foreign country, such bill of lading in the hands of any bona-fide holder, for valuable consideration, who acquired the same in the usual course of trade without any notice of any defect therein, shall be conclusive evidence that the goods described therein were actually received by such carrier in the manner and for the purpose therein stated.

EAST.

TEN prisoners escaped from the County Jail at Uniontown, Pa., by breaking through the rotten floor of an unused cell into the cellar, and, making a hole in the wall, crawled through.

THREE people were killed and thirteen hurt in a smash-up on the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio Railway at Steamburg, a station half-way between Salamanca and Jamestown. The lightning express—the fastest train on the road—was half an hour late, and tore through the little town at a terrific rate of speed. While passing a freight train which had been side-tracked the engine of the express struck a broken frog, over which it passed safely, but the day coach left the track and crashed into the freight caboose, the sides of both cars being torn to splinters. On that side of the coach sat Miss Hattie Abbott, aged 20, and two relatives, Mrs. Cyrus Battey and Miss Bessy Battey, all three of Sheffield, Ill. Miss Abbott was killed almost instantly, Mrs. Battey was dangerously injured internally, and Miss Battey was slightly hurt. There were about a dozen passengers in the car, and not one escaped injury. In the caboose of the freight train the crew sat eating their dinner. Four men were on the side next the express train. Two of them—Conductor George Ellis and Brakeman James Dean, both of Meadville—were killed. Brakeman H. Shaffer, also of Meadville, was terribly injured and can hardly live, while the fourth man miraculously escaped without a scratch. A number of freight cars were completely demolished. Fifteen persons were more or less seriously injured.

THE formation of the great proposed rubber trust is now a question of only a few days, says a New York telegram. Those concerns which can manufacture rubber goods at the lowest rates will be continued in operation, while the others will shut down. The factories kept in operation will make different grades of goods, with the result of making more goods with less labor and at a much smaller cost. Instead of 8 and 9 per cent. profit, as at present, the firms interested will then be able to realize over 15 per cent. annually. The formation of this trust will have three great results. The profits for the producers will become higher and several thousand workmen will then be thrown out of employment without any other resources to fall back upon. The combine involves a working capital of $50,000,000 and an annual trade of $100,000,000.

WEST.

A DYNAMITE explosion at the works of the Hancock Chemical Company, near Hancock, Mich., destroyed No. 2 packing house and blew down the building adjoining. Three men, J. A. Armond, John Olson, and Adam Ystala, were instantly killed. The explosion was of terrific force.

SIOUX FALLS (Dak.) special: "It is the purpose of the Territorial Superintendent of Public Instruction to compile a list of every person who perished in Dakota during the fatal snow-storm of the 12th of January last, for general distribution. The work of gathering statistics is being performed by County Superintendents of Schools. The object of the publication is to contradict the exaggerated reports circulated throughout the States."

PLAINVIEW (Neb.) special: "Miss Louie M. Royce, the school-teacher who laid on the prairie all night during the recent blizzard, with three of her pupils, all of whom died in her arms, had both feet amputated here on Tuesday. Her left arm is badly deformed by large pieces of flesh dropping off, but physicians say it will probably not be necessary to amputate it."

A SAN FRANCISCO dispatch says that H. F. Noyes left Round Valley, on snow-shoes for Bodie, taking four days' rations and his dog. Nearly three weeks afterward his dog returned alone in a starving condition. Friends started out on the trail and found the dead body of Noyes in Rock Creek Canyon, lying on his face in the snow. The dog stayed with the body two weeks without food, although the rations which Mr. Noyes had taken with him were lying by his side. The track which the dog had beaten around the body and outside coyote tracks clearly showed the animal had been defending the body, and, although food was lying within reach, would not touch it without his master's permission.

SOUTH.

SHENANDOAH CITY was the scene of a terrible riot which resulted in the shooting of seven men. While employes of the Shenandoah City Colliery, which is owned by the Reading Company, were on their way home they were met by a lot of boys who hooted and jeered at them. The men kept on and paid no attention to the boys until they became so rough that the coal and iron policemen were compelled to interfere. A few minutes later a mob of 500 strikers pounced upon the men who had assailed the boys, and the officers opened fire on the crowd. John Cathers, Mike Heffern, Patrick Brennan, John Brown, two Hungarians, and one of the coal and iron police were wounded, one probably fatally. Four of the strikers were arrested, taken to a justice office, and held to bail. Later the strikers made a rush on the Magistrate's office, broke the windows, and almost tore out the front.

BURGLARS entered the jewelry store of Chapman & Gale, in Norfolk, Va., through a skylight, took the door off the safe, and stole all the diamonds, gold watches, and valuable jewelry in the stock of the firm. The latter were carrying a large stock of the Rockford Watch Company's goods, which they were selling on the club plan. The value of the goods stolen is estimated at $30,000. No trace of the burglars has yet been ascertained.

TOM ELLIS, editor of the Birmingham, Ala., Herald, was shot by Detective Sullivan for publishing a libel.

SIX children of Lester Singletary, of Columbus County, South Carolina, were burned to death while their parents were attending church.

WASHINGTON.

A PETITION was presented to the U. S. Senate on Friday from the President of the Johnson & Fuller Manufacturing Company of Madison, Wis., for the abolition of all import duties on agricultural machinery, on the ground that such duties were superfluous and useless, and that no agricultural machinery would be imported if the duties were wholly discontinued.

A WASHINGTON dispatch states that "the President has approved and promulgated a revision of the civil-service rules, which makes several very important changes in the system of appointments upon tests of fitness applied to applicants for places in the departments at Washington and in the classified customs offices and postoffices. The commission has also revised the civil-service regulations to conform to the new rules. These revisions have been under consideration by the commission during the greater part of a year, and both have received careful consideration by President Cleveland. He read them at length several times, and made changes and modifications both of matter and phraseology. Not one of the old rules or regulations remains in its original form."

LABOR.

CLARKE & CO.'s Solar Iron Works, at Pittsburg, have resumed operations with non-union men.

A COLLISION took place at Pittsburgh, Pa., between the non-union men at the Solar Iron Works and the strikers. Pistols were used, and three persons were shot, one, a boy, it is thought fatally.

AT Pottsville, Pa., a number of disobedient Knights of Labor went to work in a colliery, and when they emerged from the mine they were met by an angry mob of women, two gray-haired beldames bearing rusty muskets in their hands. A young lass made an impassioned appeal to the recreant workmen, and ended by flinging a loaf of bread among them. This was followed by a bread bombardment from the rest of the excited women, and nothing but the rapid departure of a train of cars in which the non-striking miners took refuge prevented a scene of bloodshed.

WAR is raging between the striking miners at Shenandoah, Pa., and those who are employed there.

THE strike at the Illinois Central yards at Centralia, Ill., has been practically patched up.

POLITICS.

THE Minnesota Republican League had a two days' conference at Minneapolis. Candidates and platforms were not discussed, the League voting to support the Republican candidate for President. F. E. Searles of St. Cloud was elected permanent chairman of the League. Resolutions were passed pledging the State to the Republican party, extending sympathy to Ireland, and scoring the Democratic party for not admitting Dakota. A protection resolution was voted down.

THE Republican State Central Committee met at New Orleans on Tuesday and filled the vacancies on the ticket, which, reconstructed, will stand as follows: Governor, Henry C. Warmoth of Plaquemine; Lieutenant Governor, Andrew Hero of Orleans; Auditor, James Forsythe of Catahoula; Treasurer, Benjamin F. Flanders of Lafayette; Secretary of State, John F. Patty (colored) of Terrebonne; Attorney General, Robert Ray of Ouachita. The committee decided that the office of Superintendent of Public Instruction was non-political, and voted to support Joseph A. Breaux of Iberia, the Democratic candidate for that position. Warmoth announces his acceptance of the nomination for Governor in a public letter. He is in strict accord with most of the principles enunciated in the Democratic State platform. He favors white supremacy, promises the retention of faithful servants in office, and advises Republicans in local contests to vote for the best man, hoping that Democrats will do the same.

FOREIGN.

THE announcement that Prince Bismarck would speak on the military bill attracted an enormous crowd to the vicinity of the Reichstag, says a Berlin dispatch of the 7th inst. Long before the day's business began the galleries were filled to overflowing. Prince Bismarck was enthusiastically greeted on his way to the Reichstag palace by dense crowds which lined the route. When he entered the Reichstag he was received with deafening cheers. The House proceeded with the first reading of the military loan bill, and Prince Bismarck arose to address the House. He said:

I do not believe I can add anything to the true state of the case regarding the bill. I do not address you on that account. My object is to speak of the general situation of Europe. I may confine myself to referring to what I said on the same subject over a year ago. There has been very little change since then, when I feared war with France. Since then France has elected a peace-loving President, and a pacific disposition has prevailed. I can, therefore, reassure the public that, so far as France is concerned the prospect has become more peaceful. Regarding Russia also I am of no other opinion than when I said that we have to apprehend no attack from Russia. The situation must not be judged from press comments. The Russian newspapers I do not believe. I believe the Czar's word absolutely. The situation on the whole is no different from that of 1874. I grant that the concentration of Russian troops on the frontier may appear serious, but I perceive no cause or pretext for a Russian or European war. Russia has no interest to conquer Prussian or Austrian provinces. Indeed, I go so far in my confidence as to say that even a war with France would not necessitate a war with Russia, although the latter eventually would involve the former. It is true that I cannot demand an explanation from the Russian Foreign Office regarding the concentration of troops on the frontier, but having been well acquainted with Russia's foreign policy for a generation I may have my own opinion of the matter. I believe the Russian Cabinet intends to make Russia's voice heard at the next European crisis, and, therefore, wishes to push her military forces as far westward as possible.

Prince Bismarck then reviewed the relations of Prussia with Russia since 1848. Frequently, he said, they had had a menacing aspect, but at all times the calmness and conscientiousness displayed by the ministers on the Prussian side toward the threatening position of Russian affairs—a position of which foreign countries had no idea—had succeeded in averting mischief. He continued:

Austria is our natural ally in the dangers which threaten us from Russia and France, but there is no need to fear the hatred of Russia. No wars are waged from mere hatred, for otherwise France would have to be at war with Italy and the whole world. The strength we possess will reassure our public opinion and allay the nervousness of the bourse and the press. Our task now is to strengthen this strength. It must not be said that others can place the same defensive frontier force as we are able to do. If we are attacked, then the furor Teutonicus will flame. We hope to remain at peace with Russia, as with all other powers, but we do not run after anybody. Russia has no grounds for complaint of Germany's attitude on the Bulgarian question.

Prince Bismarck reiterated the confidence that Germany felt in her army, and declared that Germany feared "only the God which makes us wish to foster peace."

GENERAL.

A PITTSBURGH dispatch says that a natural-gas expert has returned to that city from Chicago with some bottled samples of the new fuel as found there. An analysis shows it to be natural gas, but of that quality known as surface gas. It is totally useless as a fuel because of lack of quantity, and has no more pressure than is to be found at the mouth of an illuminating or artificial gas-burner. This expert says that if Chicago wants to use natural gas as a fuel she must pipe it for a longer distance than has yet been done even in the natural-gas regions of Pennsylvania. He says it will have to be piped from sections of Indiana and Ohio.

BRADSTREET'S, in its review of the trade outlook, has these encouraging words:

The movement of merchandise at Boston, New York, Pittsburg, Louisville, Memphis, Chicago, St. Paul, Burlington, Kansas City, St. Joseph, St. Louis, and New Orleans has generally tended to increase, the snow blockade having been raised, and the progress of trade being toward increased activity. From all directions word comes that the outlook for spring business was never better, and that the volume of goods distributed during January exceeded the like total in 1887. An examination of railroad earnings per mile for [illegible] years shows that seventy companies earned an average of $5,538 per mile in 1887, against $5,159 in 1886, $5,194 in 1885, and $5,542 in 1884. The outlook is uncertain for the coal-miners strike in the near future. Within a month twenty-three iron furnaces have banked their fires, owing mainly to increased cost of coal, rendering 2,200 employes idle. The reports of business failures number 280 in the United States this week, against 259 last week, and 242 this week last year.

THE United States Government will arm postal employes employed on the exposed Western railroad routes.

AN EVENTFUL CONTEST.

Nathaniel P. Banks' Election as Speaker of the House Commemorated.

Reunion of the Surviving Republican Members Who Took Part in the Struggle.

[Washington special.]

Thirty-two years ago Nathaniel P. Banks was elected Speaker of the House of Representatives, after the most memorable struggle for that position ever known. Wednesday night, at the club-house of the Republican National League, the surviving supporters of General Banks held a reunion. Just before the eleventh ballot on that day the leaders of the various factions had gathered together in one of the cloak-rooms and agreed to a resolution that whoever should receive the highest vote on that ballot should be declared Speaker. General Banks had 103, and his nearest competitor 100, but three votes made Mr. Banks Speaker. Of the 283 Representatives and 62 Senators who opened the session of that fateful Congress on the 3d of December in 1855, only two men yet remain under the dome of the Capitol. They are John Sherman and Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, who were both members of the House. Of the 103 men who voted for Gen. Banks only twenty-two are known to survive. This Congress contained Joshua R. Giddings, Schuyler Colfax, Anson Burlingame, Mason W. Tappan, Elihu B. Washburne, John Sherman, Justin S. Morrill, and Galusha A. Grow, but of these only Sherman, Morrill, and Grow remain. The other nineteen who survive are Sidney Dean, of Connecticut; William Cumback, of Indiana; John J. Perry, of Maine; Calvin C. Chaffee, Linneus B. Comins, Chauncey L. Knapp, Timothy Davis, and Mark Trafton, of Massachusetts; Aaron H. Cragin and James Pike, of New Hampshire; O. B. Matteson, Guy R. Pelton, Russell Sage, Francis E. Spinner, James S. T. Stranahan, and Edward Dodd, of New York; John A. Bingham, of Ohio; James H. Campbell and John J. Pierce, of Pennsylvania. Nearly all of these gentlemen were present, and Gen. Banks presided. The programme of the reunion included a dinner and afterward a reception to Gen. Banks at the Union League club-house.

THE COLBATH FAMILY.

Death of the Only Brother of the Famous Vice President, Henry Wilson.

[Vassar (Mich.) special.]

Winthrop Colbath, a brother of the late Vice-President Henry Wilson, was buried here on Wednesday. Mr. Colbath came to Tuscola County in 1868, and was engaged in agricultural and mercantile pursuits until 1881, when he removed to East Saginaw, where he died Saturday. He was a thoughtful, earnest man, of fine native talents, but he lacked the benefit of an early education. The story of the Colbaths, as related by Winthrop and substantiated by the history of the late Vice-President Wilson, was a romantic one. The mother, daughter of an English aristocrat, fell in love with and married Thomas Colbath, a servant in her father's family, and the couple fled to America, followed by the anathema of the blue-blooded Briton. They settled in Niagara County, New York, but subsequently removed to New Hampshire, where Jeremiah, the eldest son, was born. When he was five years old a Massachusetts shoemaker named Wilson became acquainted with the family, and persuaded them to place "Jerry" in his charge. The lad was taken to Massachusetts, instructed in the mysteries of shoemaking, but given a moderate education withal, and finally was legally adopted by his benefactor, who gave him the name, Henry Wilson.

A ROMANCE OF THE BLIZZARD.

The Happy Thought of a Farmer to Save Himself from the Storm.

[Sioux City (Iowa) special.]

The biggest authenticated blizzard story of the season comes from Aurora County, Iowa. When the great storm of Jan. 12 swept over that county, Eric Johnson, a farmer, was watering his cattle some distance from his buildings. He used his utmost exertions to drive the cattle home, but without avail, as very shortly they, as well as himself, were exhausted. Among the drove of cattle was a very large ox, which soon became bewildered and lay down to die close to where Johnson was floundering in the snow. At this moment Johnson, who was making frantic efforts to save himself was seized with an inspiration which impelled him quickly to kill the ox, disembowel him, and crawl inside. After drawing the sides of the stomach together he was completely sheltered from the terrific storm by the warm carcass of the ox, and passed the night in safety and comparative comfort. When morning dawned, however, and he endeavored to crawl out of his peculiar habitation, he discovered to his horror that the ox was frozen solid, his knife outside, and himself a secure prisoner. He kept up a shouting at intervals until 2 o'clock, when his cries were heard by parties who were searching for his frozen body, and he was helped out of his hole none the worse for his peculiar experience.

VESSEL TRAFFIC ON THE LAKES.

Citizens of Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota Ask a Big Appropriation.

A big delegation of prominent business men from points in Wisconsin, Minnesota, Michigan, Ohio, New York, and other States whose citizens are interested in the vessel traffic of the great lakes invaded Washington last week and had a hearing before the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors. They ask for liberal appropriations for improvements in the line of the great water route to the Northwest. The particular measure which the party of solid business men urge Congress to favor is the one introduced recently by Representative Farquhar, appropriating in a lump some $7,000,000 for the completion of improvements already begun at different points between Buffalo and Duluth. The most important works for which this vast sum is asked are the strengthening and deepening of the channel of the Detroit River, the dredging of the lakes between St. Clair and Huron, the dredging of Hog Lake Channel in the St. Mary's River connecting Lakes Huron and St. Clair, and the enlargement of the locks at the great ship canal at Sault Ste. Marie. According to a recent report by the War Department, more vessels pass through this canal in a given month during the season of navigation than enter the port of Liverpool.

LIFE IN IRELAND.

Sullivan Ready to Undergo Further Imprisonment.

[Cable dispatch from Dublin.]

Ex-Lord Mayor Sullivan was greeted by a large crowd on his release from Tullamore jail, and various delegations presented him with addresses. Mr. Sullivan, in a speech, said that he once desired a greater measure of independence for Ireland, but now he thought that Mr. Gladstone's proposals were a fair compromise, and would unite the two nations in peace and good-fellowship. He urged the people to join the National League, and to meet secretly if they could not meet openly. Mr. Sullivan said he was ready to undergo further imprisonment for Ireland.

NATIONAL LAW-MAKERS.

What Is Being Done by the National Legislature.

THE bill to increase the pension of the totally helpless to $72 per month passed the Senate on the 6th inst. Mr. Cullom introduced a bill permitting officers who have served in one grade for twenty-one years to draw the pay of the next higher grade, or be retired on the pay allowed to retired officers of the next grade. Mr. Beck addressed the Senate on the President's tariff message and in reply to Mr. Sherman's speech on the same subject. Mr. Sherman replied to Mr. Beck, and Mr. Reagan spoke briefly in defense of the administration tariff policy. Mr. Plumb addressed the Senate in favor of his resolution regarding inefficient mail service in the South and West. Mr. Ingalls announced the appointment of the following special committee on the Pacific Railroad funding bills and the President's message and commission reports: Messrs. Frye, Dawes, Hiscock, Davis, Morgan, Butler and Hearst. In the House of Representatives, Mr. Crain, of Texas, from the Committee on Presidential Elections, etc., reported a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment providing that Congress shall hold its annual meetings the first Monday in January. Mr. Ford, of Michigan, introduced a bill for the organization of the Territory of Alaska. After considerable debate the bill to prevent the transmission through the mails as second-class matter of cheap literature, and requiring it to be transmitted as third-class matter, was passed. Yeas, 145; nays, 116.

MR. DOCKERY reported a bill to the House of Representatives, on the 3d inst., authorizing the appointment of eleven division superintendents of the railway mail service. A bill was reported for the relief of the sufferers from the wreck of the Tallapoosa. Mr. Nutting, of New York, offered a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information in regard to the refusal of the Canadian authorities to allow American wrecking vessels and machinery to assist American vessels while in distress in Canadian waters and as to whether Canadian wrecking vessels and machinery are permitted to operate in American waters. The amendments were concurred in to the House bill to punish crime in the Indian Territory. The Senate was not in session.

THE White-Lowry contested election case occupied the exclusive attention of the House on the 4th inst. Mr. Cockran, of New York, made a ten-minute speech in favor of White, saying the whole case rested on his own testimony, that he lost his naturalization papers, and that he for one was unwilling to indicate a disbelief in the testimony of the brave soldier who helped to cement the Union with blood, or to tear open afresh his wounds received in defense of his country. The bill fixing times and places of holding United States courts in Minnesota makes dates as follows: In Duluth in April of each year; St. Paul in June and December; Winona in January. The urgent deficiency bill, as reported to the House, permits the use of money left over from the amount granted for the repairs of the postoffice building last year to be devoted to general repairs of the building. There was no session of the Senate.

MR. HOAR, from the select committee on the celebration of the centennial of the Constitution, reported in the Senate, on the 8th inst., a joint resolution providing, in addition to such other celebration as may hereafter be provided for, "that the two houses of Congress shall meet in the hall of the House of Representatives, that the Chief Justice of the United States shall deliver an oration." The resolution was adopted. Mr. Hale addressed the Senate in opposition to the tariff views expressed in the President's message. Mr. Carlisle resumed his duties as Speaker of the House after a two weeks' absence. The Lowry-White contest was decided in favor of Mr. White, the sitting member, by the decisive vote of 157 to 15. Forty-seven Democrats voted with the Republicans in favor of White. Among the bills and resolutions introduced in the House were the following: By Mr. Chipman, resolutions of the Detroit Board of Trade in favor of a postal telegraph; by Mr. Landes, for a public building at Olney, Ill.; by Mr. Lawler, to protect the consumers of butter by requiring wholesale dealers to pay an annual tax of $50 and retail dealers to pay an annual tax of $1; also to repeal the oleomargarine tax; by Mr. Caswell, for a public building at Racine, Wis.; by Mr. Baker, directing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of the Government purchasing the site of Old Fort Chartres, Illinois; by Mr. Peters, for a public building at Hutchinson, Kan.; by Mr. O'Neall, for a public building at Vincennes, Ind.

MR. SAWYER, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill in the Senate, on the 7th inst., providing that all soldiers who served at least ninety days in the late war and were honorably mustered out or discharged, even surgeons' certificates of disability shall be entitled to receive the same bounty to which they would have been entitled had their full term of enlistment been served out. Mr. Stockbridge, of Michigan, introduced a bill amending to oblige engineers, and mates of steam vessels, or their heirs, the license fees which they have paid since the law was passed in 1884, licenses hereafter are to be free. He also introduced a bill making it obligatory upon every sort of steamer to carry at all times a full complement of licensed officers and a full crew. The law now applies only to passenger steamers. The Senate also adopted a resolution directing the Commerce Committee to inquire into the right and expediency of Congress assuming control of the erection of bridges over navigable waters within State limits. A bill to grant a pension of $12 per month to army nurses was reported favorably from the Senate Committee on Pensions. The House of Representatives adopted Gen. Weaver's resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for detailed information relative to the recent policy of the department of purchasing bonds with surplus money and to the present policy of depositing funds in a large number of national banks. The House also adopted the resolution of Mr. Landes calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information regarding the amount of United States bonds and notes in circulation when the act of 1878 limiting their issue was passed, and whether any have been lost or destroyed since. Among the measures passed by the House were bills providing for the punishment of bank-examiners for false reports or suppressing facts in their reports; to abolish the minimum punishment in internal-revenue cases, and authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to compromise cases under the law; to amend the law prescribing the death penalty for willfully casting away vessels so as to allow punishment by fine or imprisonment if there is no loss of life. The Committee on Military Affairs reported a bill authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasanton as a Brigadier General. The Foreign Affairs Committee reported the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. It appropriates $1,403,867. Mr. Tillman, from the Military Committee, reported the military academy appropriation bill.

A Wise Woman Knows When to Be Silent.

Mrs. H. W. Beecher in Pittsburg Dispatch: No matter how much a woman may crave gentle attentions and loving notice, if wise she will teach herself to understand the great power she may earn by silence—not grim, unamiable silence, but that which gently, unostentatiously tends to peace. Its patient continuance will often enlighten the eyes which have been unconsciously holden to the unintentional neglect which has, perhaps, left shadows on the home life, and once recognized they will love and honor the wife all the more for the quiet lesson she has taught by her silence. There are times in men's lives far more than in women's when any reply to hasty or careless remarks or complaints, however just, of inattention or supposed neglect would be most untimely, and, perhaps, cause serious trouble.

A women in comfortable health naturally rises in the morning in a cheerful, happy frame of mind, inclined to sprightly conversation, and, were her husband able to be equally so, could in those few moments of morning converse and greeting drink in enough nectar to make her eyes bright and her step elastic all day long. But a life of business or public duties is seldom conducive to a good night's rest or a cheerful, happy waking. It often happens that the short time devoted to waking and dressing are the very moments when a wise woman will hold her peace, content to know that kindly attentions and pleasant words have more power and are better appreciated after a hot steak or chop and a good cup of coffee than before.

Why Women Are Nervous.

Professor Redom, the eminent German hygienist, declared in a recent lecture that the nervousness of women is generally owing to two defects—anemia, caused by the silly notion that a hearty appetite is unfeminine, and fresh-air starvation, accompanied by a lack of exercise. To their fondness for fresh air, their open windows at night, and their constant exercise he attributes the greater beauty of the English women. "The beauty of the German women," he says, "lies in their face, with its changing and amiable expression. The beauty of the English lies in the whole body and in their health. German women," he adds, "are martyrs to an unnatural state of civilization, and if they would only imitate the English, hysteria would diminish in frequency."

CUSTER'S LAST STAND.

A Famous Scout, Who Has Gathered Much Information of the Massacre, Relates Facts Hitherto Unpublished and Contradicts an Old Story.

[Chicago special.]

Edward H. Allison, the celebrated Government scout, passed through Chicago a few days ago on his way to Washington. This famous Indian hunter came into prominence ten years ago, when he succeeded in bringing about without aid the surrender of Sitting Bull and his murderous band of Sioux Indians. Scout Allison, as the army officers call him, is a remarkably intelligent man, and, in spite of his rough exterior, has the carriage of a gentleman. In a talk with a Chicago reporter he told of the events that brought about the prolonged and bloody warfare between Sitting Bull's band and the United States. He blames the Indian agents for it all. As an illustration, he mentioned the case of an agent who some years ago had charge of the Standing Rock agency. This agent, the scout claims, made $50,000 in eighteen months by cheating the Indians out of what was justly due them. He made them live on soup and ax-handles. These were the only goods the agent could not trade for furs. To his own personal knowledge, a steamer loaded with three hundred tons of provisions and annuity goods, consisting of clothing, blankets, tobacco, and general supplies, intended for distribution among the Indians connected with the Sioux tribe, had touched at the agency, but after taking the invoices the agent had sent the goods five hundred miles farther up the river, where they were traded for his personal advantage. By a bit of rascality the invoices were returned to the Government Supply Department with forged certificates of distribution attached. The scout related this incident in a manner that indicated his cordial contempt for the transaction, and his frank, open countenance changed expression altogether as he told of other episodes that led to the death of his friend, the gallant Custer, on that memorable day in June, 1876.

Allison has acquired more facts concerning this tragic circumstance than any man in the country. This intelligence has been obtained by diligent inquiry among the squaws and children of the warriors who participated in the massacre. The Indians could not tell the story and no whites were left to relate it. "Rain-in-the-Face" did not kill Custer, Allison declares, although he is credited with so doing. Neither was he at the battle. The scout has the proof that "Rain-in-the-Face" was watching the movements of Gen. Crook's troops fifty miles away when Custer met his death. Crook was then advancing from the south.

Regarding the battle, Allison says that Maj. Reno, who has since been dismissed from the United States army, was alone to blame for the slaughter of Custer and his men. It was due solely to Reno's cowardice, and at the inquiry that followed the Major was whitewashed simply through the shame his brother officers felt at having him as a companion. Custer has been accused of rashness, whereas he acted altogether correctly and in accordance with the surroundings and his knowledge of the Indian mode of fighting. His manner of attack was well planned. The redskins were greatly surprised. When Custer swooped down upon them their horses were grazing untethered on the plains, and their tepees or huts were standing upright. During the panic that followed the sudden appearance of this galloping band of cavalrymen, one of Sitting Bull's wives forgot one of her twin babies, and left it behind her in her flight. The child was subsequently named "Fled and Abandoned." He bears that name to-day.

Reno's eyes, the scout says, gave every woman and child the appearance of a warrior of the Sitting Bull character. He gave the order to retreat without apparent cause, and before he had lost a man. Major Reno's command numbered 270 men all told, and Custer had about the same number. Captain Benteen, who commanded the third division, had two companies, or about 130 men. The attacking force numbered very close to 700, all well mounted. Captain Benteen joined forces with Reno on the hill about two miles from where Custer was. The Indians, seeing that Reno was retreating, called to their flying comrades to return and give battle; that the whites were cowards. As soon as Sitting Bull could gather his braves together he left enough of his warriors and boys to engage Reno's soldiers and then threw his whole fighting force on Custer and his doomed band. Sitting Bull's entire army did not number more than 1,200 men, but his warriors were good fighters and well armed with Winchester repeating rifles and other modern appliances of warfare.

Capt. Benteen begged Reno to hasten to Custer's aid, predicting a massacre should he not re-enforce him; but even then it was too late. If Reno had held the position he had before ordering a retreat, ten minutes longer, Custer would have struck the camp at the lower end and gone through it as easily as a bull could plow through a corn-field. The whole Indian question would have then and there been settled. But Sitting Bull and his warriors were the victors, and a five years' bloody warfare followed.

Allison's assiduous inquiry leads him to believe that it took about an hour to concentrate all his men. The great Sioux chief threw a wall of redskins about the cavalrymen, and then the slaughter began. That Custer died hard was demonstrated by the fact that the ground about where his body was found by General Terry's troops the following day was thick with cartridge shells. Strange as it may appear, only twenty-seven of Sitting Bull's braves were killed during the fight. The scout has made careful inquiry and is quite positive on this point. Major Reno lost thirteen men during his retreat. As soon as the work of extermination was complete a carnival of butchery and mutilation began. The atrocities of the squaws was simply barbarous. Sitting Bull and his chiefs searched for Custer's body, but could not find it. They knew him as the "Long-haired Chief," but as the General had his hair cut in the spring before starting out on the expedition, they did not recognize him, so the barbarous story of "Rain-in-the Face" cutting out his heart and eating a piece of it goes for naught.

It was by the merest chance in the world that Custer's body was not mutilated. His was the only corpse that was not disfigured. If the Indians had recognized his remains there would not have been enough of him left for his wife to identify him by. Every Indian who took part in the conflict would have wanted a piece of the body to carry off as a trophy. One Indian cut one of a dead soldier's arms off and carried it to camp. He afterward beat an Indian with it who was friendly to the whites on account of being a trader. Then he extended the severed hand to him that he might shake with his white brother.

CONKLING.

The New York Ex-Senator Favors Phil Sheridan for President.

A Connecticut paper prints an interview with Hon. Roscoe Conkling, in which that gentleman is represented as expressing himself in favor of the nomination by the Republicans of Gen. Sheridan for the Presidency, with Gen. Gresham as second choice. Mr. Conkling, however, expressed the belief that neither of these gentlemen would be nominated. He thought it would be Blaine, or Sherman, or Allison.

THE NATIONAL GAME.

John Clarkson the Only Man Now Wanted by the Chicago Club.

The Detroit Club Will Not Secure Andrews—Its Team This Year.

[CHICAGO CORRESPONDENCE.]

When the Chicago Club signed Fred Pfeffer last week, it secured one of the two men whose services it especially desires for the coming season. Clarkson is now the only base-ball player in the country whom Capt. Anson feels anxious over, and the big fellow would like to see John's name to a Chicago contract, notwithstanding that he has asserted the club's ability to go through the season creditably without John's services if it had to do so. With the signing of Clarkson the White Stockings would be in splendid trim for the season's play, but the Nonpareil's determination, so often expressed, that he will not put his name to a Spalding contract seems to be sincere and final. Still there are many queer things said and done in base-ball these days, and it need not startle anybody if at the last moment Clarkson should consent to jump into the blue uniform of the Chicagos and make another gallant fight for the flag.

The Chicagos will leave for Hot Springs about March 1. They will play two weeks in Arkansas and then go to New Orleans, where they have dates with a local club. The ex-champions will then work their way North by easy stages, playing in all of the Southern League cities. In this preliminary play the boys will wear heavy navy blue flannel suits, which are now being made by Spalding's mutable tailors. The trip is expected to cover about seven weeks.

THE DETROIT TEAM.

The management of the Detroit Club has probably given up all hope of securing the services for next season of Ed Andrews, the crack out-fielder of the Philadelphia team. Philadelphia's desire to secure a fancy price for the player's release was what scared Detroit off. They say $5,000 would not be any offer for Andrews, and hint that even $7,500 would not take his release, but $10,000 would. The Detroit club is probably not in want of good players bad enough to pay any such money as this, and they evidently do not feel disposed to trade Hanlon and Richardson for Andrews, as the Philadelphia management would like to have them. Twitchell was the only man ever thought of in the light of an exchange, and even this was never mentioned to Philadelphia. The champions for 1888 will without doubt be made up as follows: Getzein, Gruber, Baldwin, Conway and Beatin, pitchers; Ganzell, Bennett, Sutcliff and Broughton, catchers; Brouthers, first base; Richardson, second base; White, third base; Rowe, short stop; Twitchell, left field; Hanlon, center field and captain; Thompson, right field; Scherbeck and Springer, substitutes.

BALL-PLAYERS' SALARIES.

It is a fact worthy of remark that the men who have drawn the biggest salaries for ball playing the past two years have by no means played the best game of ball. The fancy salary evil has been steadily growing during the past three years, and no greater evil menaces the future of the national game than this. Said a base-ball manager the other day: "The three highest salaried men in the League last year were Dunlap, Kelly, and Radbourn. Fred Dunlap could not get into the Chicago Club to-morrow if Pittsburg were to make President Spalding a present of that player's release to-day. He has gone to the Pittsburg Club from Detroit, and has taken with him to the first-named organization an atmosphere of discontent that threatens to cause Nimick, Phillips & Co. no small amount of trouble. Players who have been with the team for several seasons and who have clearly proven their loyalty to the club are asked to sign this year for one-half the salary which the club proposes to pay Dunlap. Naturally they have refused to sign. Naturally they look upon Dunlap as an interloper, and who can blame them for so doing? I confess that I am 'agin' Dunlap and all players of his class. Not that I have anything personal against them, or that I am in the least bit envious of their bull-headed luck, but simply because, as a lover of justice, fair play and square dealing, I don't like to see men like Dunlap and Radbourn stepping over the heads of deserving, conscientious, hard-working fellows such as Galvin and Miller, and the rest of the boys who have asserted their manhood far enough to refuse to go upon the field and do the same amount of work for half the money that Dunlap, an interloper, is receiving. 'Stick to it, boys,' is my advice to these men. If the Pittsburg Club management wants to do business on that basis make them pay for it. I told Director O'Neil in this city that if his club signed Dunlap it would regret it. I am still betting dollars to cents that such will be the case.

"As to the other players I have mentioned, take Kelly, for instance. He is not half so good a man in the Boston Club at $5,000 a year as he was in the Chicago Club at $2,500, and Radbourn is not worth the price of his uniform to Soden, Conant and Billings.

"If it were possible to take these high-priced players and the men who have made them such, and drop them into the lake—clear the ranks of them as one would clear a flower-garden of so many weeds—it would be an almighty good thing for the game. President Spalding has some very sound ideas on this same question. Said he the other day: 'I am willing to pay my men every dollar they are worth to the club; but no man in my employ shall bluff me into paying him a bigger salary than I pay others who are his equals as ball players. Neither will I take a new man from some other team, no matter how great his reputation and ability, or how great his drawing power, and put him over the heads of my tried players at a fancy salary. It is ruinous business, and these clubs who are doing it will find to their cost that such is the case. I hope that business will enable me to advance the salaries of every one of my men a little each year. It is my wish to do this. Not a great advance, understand, for the grade of salaries as it is now is just about as great a pressure as the business will stand. Still I would like to be able each year to advance the boys a hundred or two, so long as the business will stand it. When the season has been a good one I can do this, and will do it, but if the season should prove a poor one I could not do it, and the boys would have to in that way share a little of the ill-luck with us. This is the basis upon which the Chicago Club will operate in future, and it is dollars to cents that it will result in the Chicago Club's being on deck when some of these other organizations have been forgotten.'"

Ed Andrews was asked the other day how long it took a man to become an expert ball player, and promptly replied three years. Deacon White said it took all of three years and sometimes five. Amateurs are not easily molded into professionals. There are tricks of the trade with which the general public are not at all familiar or even acquainted. It takes longer to make a good player out of an amateur, Andrews says, than out of a green man. The trouble with the amateur is he thinks he knows it all before he becomes a professional. That is why so many promising amateurs are failures—they are not willing to learn.

President Spalding, of the Chicago club, has left for a month's trip through the South. He is accompanied by his wife, and will go to New Orleans and sail from there for Havana. After a week's stay in the Cuban capital he will return to America, touching at Jacksonville, St. Augustine, Savannah, Charleston, Richmond, Washington, and Philadelphia, reaching New York in time for the League meeting there in March.

Fred Pfeffer has secured the score-card privilege at the Chicago Ball Park for the coming season and will probably secure those of the Western Association games.

AT EVE.

BY WM. HAUGHTON.

[illegible]

I dimly saw the fair young face
And traced the childish form,
But all the holy, happy place
With breathing love was warm.
The robin paused a while to hear
The plaintive music trembling near,
Then with a songburst wild and free,
Poured out his heart in melody.

O happy child, methinks there came
A seraph from the throng,
And on the snowy wings of flame
Caught up thy rapturous song;
The deepening dusk from yonder skies
Drank in the azure of thine eyes;
The night upon thy fair young head
Its dews of balm and blessing shed.

Some angel sent that song to win
My faith upon its wings;
To wake the music quite within
To heaven and holy things.
I may forget that fair, sweet form,
The hour with twilight beauty warm,
But roam I still the wide world o'er,
The song will haunt me nevermore.

The Stolen Fortune

BY Abbie C. McKeever

CHAPTER XVI.

SKETE had early learned that prudence is the better part of valor, and, consequently, not without a quake in his heart, did he draw rein instantly at that peremptory command.

Out from a wayside bush stepped a tall, rough-looking fellow, clad in the usual garb of a hunter and plainsman, and Skete thought his large sombrero covered about the ugliest, glummest looking specimen of humanity he ever beheld.

"'Fore de Lor', boss, how you skeered me!"

"You don't turn very pale, if I did," laughed the man coarsely, chewing vigorously his mouthful of tobacco and leaning lazily on his rifle. "Where be you goin', Black Joe?"

"My name ain't Black Joe, it's Skete, an' I'm on my way home from de Indian country back dar."

"Ah, my handsome dark friend, so you've been in the Indian country? Did you see any Indians?"

"Yes, boss; a plenty. I lodged in their village."

"Likely he. Why, there ain't a redskin as lives that would let a nigger go scot free."

"But they did, boss; dey nebber touched Skete."

"Ho! ho! and they give you that ar pony to ride back home on, and a kiss, no doubt, of good-by."

"No, boss, dey didn't gib me no pony, nor no kiss 'tall; I jist took de pony, an' rode off in de night."

"How long ago?"

"Three, four days."

"And you've been all this time in the mountains, and nobody shot or scalped you?"

"Yes, boss."

"Now where are you going?"

"I tole you, boss, while ago. I'm going back to de ole home; de ranch in Nebraska—or de place where de ranch was; it am burned down now."

"Burned down, eh! Oh, yes; I begin to see daylight myself. Very well, my dark friend, you'll come along o' me for the present, and I'll show you a short cut across the country."

Skete didn't like the idea of accepting his present new acquaintance as a guide, but he had not the courage to say as much, and with sinking heart he followed him to where his pony was grazing, and when he had mounted him rode quietly along by his side.

"You don't look overjoyed, my colored friend, but as we jog along suppose you tell me something about that visit of yours to the Indians."

Skete complied the best he could, and his account was graphic and, his hearer felt convinced, truthful.

"Well, well," he mused, "you seem to bear a charmed life, sure enough, but I tell you it's lucky for you none o' them redskins caught you making off with that pony; if they had you'd never lived to tell the story of what happened then. Now we're to go northward."

She wandered down to the river bank.

"But I—I want to go East. I'm powerful anxious to see Miss Nora, boss."

"Yes; very likely. Didn't I tell you I knew a short cut? Come on, you black rascal, an' none o' yer foolin'. I won't stand it."

Skete saw his hand rested on his revolver, and tremblingly yet very unwillingly he followed by his side, pretty well satisfied he was going farther and farther every step from the old home on the prairies.

"Skete had better lay lo. Skete beginning to find out dis yer country, and when de time does come now Skete make tracks afoot, back where Skete knows der am friens who will take him to Miss Nora."

At midnight they had penetrated far into the mountains, where all at once Skete began to realize that his surroundings were familiar.

"Golly, dis yer de very place where Jim Gregory bring me," thought he, but he prudently kept silent. "Trees an' rocks an' roads. Yes, we be going straight back to Satan's Roost. Oh, Lor'! what'll ole Jim do wid dis yer darkey?"

But when they rode up to the outlaws' secret home, Jim Gregory gave a real jolly laugh at the sight of Skete's black, frightened face.

"Land alive, man, where did you run across that chap? Well, of all things! Why, Skete, my boy, I thought the Indians had made mincemeat or broiled meat out of you. How in thunderation did ye ever git away from em?"

"I—I jist rode away, boss."

"His story's a good one," said his companion; "you'll have to let him tell it in his own way, Captain; but we're both derned hungry. Got anything for a feller to eat, and any news worth mentioning?"

He saw some king more.

"Plenty o' truck if Skete can cook it; an' there's a big thing on hands—an', besides, the old Captain made his appearance awhile ago."

"I thought he'd said good-by to Satan's Roost fur good."

"So he did, it seems, till he run across—— There, Skete, hurry along. You know the way now; fly!"

Reluctantly Skete departed. He wondered much what great things were about to be communicated, but he was hungry and began preparations for supper with alacrity.

There appeared to be only a few of the men around the premises, and Skete felt that there was a possible chance for his escape.

"Golly, I guess Skete kn w de way dis time; every tree an' bush Skete watch; jes let dem robber scamps drop off sleep an' Skete crawl out and am off fur shure to Miss Nora."

In the dusk of the mountain shadows and pines, with supper over, Skete began to feel new hopes springing up in his bosom, and could scarcely refrain from breaking out in song.

The men lingered in the shadow of the trees around their fire, and Skete crept back in the darkness of the sheltered nest, or rather played-out claim-well, named now Satan's Roost.

A faint light gleamed at the far end, and as Skete wonderingly drew near with cautious tread he saw something move from a bed of skins, and as he advanced a low, startled cry greeted his approach.

"Merciful heavens! Oh, thank God! Skete, dear, dear old Skete, is it really you?"

"'Fore de Lor', Miss Nora, honey, it's nebber you."

CHAPTER XVII.

LESTER GRAY had been in the West long enough to be tolerably well up to its dangers, and it was with a wildly beating heart and troubled brain that he set out to rescue Nora from whatever evil might menace her.

He inferred naturally that Nora would ride toward the mountains. The novelty and beauty of the scene would entice her to enter; once in their treacherous paths and roads she had no doubt become lost, or else had been waylaid by bandits or captured by some party of sneaking redskins, who occasionally still wandered about their old hunting grounds.

"I myself may become lost if I venture across the mountains. I had better seek a guide and begin my search with some method," thought Lester.

He reasoned well, and an excellent guide was at once secured, a man who had long been a hunter and Indian fighter, and knew the secret passes and canyons of the Rockies equal to any Indian.

When Lester appealed to him his answer was to begin looking after the condition of his firearms, without a word of reply.

Impatient at his silence, Lester exclaimed:

"You'll not refuse. Surely, you are willing to help me find this dear friend that I fear is in danger."

Then old Rube looked at him queerly, and dryly remarked:

"Young man, what you take me for? I reckon I'll do what I kin."

But when they were ready Rube refused to ride, saying:

"I don't need no hoss. I prefer to take the kind nature provides. You ride ahead. I'll catch you 'fore you know it."

And Lester dashed away, only to find, when he reached the base of the mountain and approached the broad mountain road, old Rube there in advance.

"How in the world?" he began.

The old hunter and trapper smiled grimly.

"I told you I git along all right an' besides I knew a short cut. You had best turn that feller loose an' let him return to town. I'm of the opinion the gal didn't take to the road, but has followed some one o' them treacherous trails."

"What makes you think that?"

"Oh, gals are skittish critters generally, most always doin' what they've no business to——Ah!"

"What! have you discovered anything?"

Rube scratched his head and pondered a moment as if puzzled.

"Yes, there's been two or three persons went in this here trail, one o' the wust in the Rockies, too; two hosses I should say an'—an' I believe a feller afoot. I'm purty sure o' the two hosses, one o' them I calculates is the gal's pony."

"Then let us hasten after her at once."

"Not so fast, young man, you don't know the beauties o' that trail, but I do, an' besides there's another way heap better for a feller afoot. We'll go that way. Come on, if you want to, but, mind you keep quiet. It's a gitten too tarnel dark to trail any way, but we'll probably gain just as much to go straight through this way."

Lester had always prided himself on his nimbleness of foot and his powers of endurance, but he now found them tested to the utmost.

How Rube managed to swing himself across precipices, steep, seemingly impassable places, clinging for dear life now to a stout bush, now a ledge of overhanging rocks, was a thing not easy for a tenderfoot to imitate.

Nevertheless, by Rube watching and encouraging his progress, Lester managed to escape any accident, and as day began to dawn, weary, covered in moist earth and almost breathless, he gazed around him.

"Here we are, pard," exclaimed Rube in his quiet, pleasant voice, that to Lester's excited feelings had a most excellent effect in soothing his troubled mind and wearied body. "Here we are at the foot of 'tother trail, and, as I expected, we're a trifle late."

"What do you mean? Has she really and truly been here?"

"Yes, I think so; but they must have left early in the night."

"They—who?"

Rube pursed up his lips and whistled and regarded Lester with a queer smile.

"Wall, really, my boy, that's a hard question; hunters, very probably, but we've a long trail ahead o' us, an' we'll eat a bite and rest an hour or so, an' then move on. I see you're purty tired and need rest."

"Ain't you the same?"

Rube shook his head.

"I never allow myself to git tired, my boy. I never go long enough for that."

"Well," laughed Lester, ruefully, "if you call the way we crossed the mountain slow, I'd like to know what your fast gait might be. But if hunters found Nora they would surely lead her back to her friends."

"Mebbe so, mebbe so."

"But if she fell into the hands of some cruel Indian party, then alas!"

"No, no, my boy, nary Injun carried her off, but we've other varmints, I kin tell you, than Injuns."

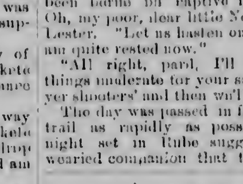
"But you said you thought it might have been some hunters."

"I did, an' so it might; but, la me! I couldn't swear to the facts o' the case. I find they hev started in a direction the opposite of the way that leads to Cheyenne."

"Heavens! Then she must have been borne off captive by some foe! Oh, my poor, dear little Nora," sighed Lester. "Let us hasten on our way, I am quite rested now."

"All right, pard, I'll try to take things moderate for your sake. See to yer shooters' and then we'll start."

The day was passed in following the trail as rapidly as possible, but as night set in Rube suggested to his wearied companion that they had better pause for the night, and get a good sleep and rest.



"Ain't you the same?"

"I kin foller the trail a heap surer by daylight, and it won't do to miss our game now, pard, so we'll eat a bit of cold lunch and sleep for a few hours. I've an idea we've a lot of trouble ahead."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Cats Among the Ancients.

In Egypt the cat was treated with great honor. We have the authority of Herodotus for the fact that when a cat died in an Egyptian home the members of the bereaved family shaved off their eyebrows, and that of Diodorus for the touching statement that although the Egyptians have been known to eat their fellow-creatures during famines, no instance of cat eating was ever heard of. If an Egyptian happened to find a dead cat, says the Sicilian historian, he was careful not to approach it closely for fear of being suspected of its murder. Standing at a distance, he made the sad loss known by cries of distress. During conflagrations, according to Herodotus, the Egyptian spectators allowed the flames to rage unchecked, devoting their attention to saving the cats belonging to the burning houses. A Roman happened one day to kill a cat by accident. The melancholy event took place at a time when the Egyptian Government was very anxious to conciliate Rome. But in spite of the exertions of the King and his ministers the mob broke into the Roman's dwelling, and intentionally did to him what he had accidentally done to the cat. Of this act of popular vengeance, Diodorus says he was a witness. According to Lenormant the cat does not appear on the Egyptian sculptures earlier than the twelfth dynasty (2020 B. C.), and therefore its domestication is due to the inhabitants of the Upper Nile. That process, remarks Hehn, must have taken a long time, but it was thoroughly successful in the end. The domestic cat very rarely deserts civilization in favor of savage freedom, its character offering in this respect a strong contrast to that of its fellow Oriental, the gypsy. How the tame cat made its way into Europe is uncertain, although it is reported to have traveled from Egypt by way of Cyprus. The period of its arrival, also, is shrouded in mystery. It does not seem to have been known in classic times, and the early centuries of our era appear to have been unaware of its existence. In so catless a period the arrival of such a beneficent beast as that which has kept Whittington's memory green might well be hailed with acclamation. It is easy to believe that the progress of the cat was very rapid when it had once shown itself. Silently, but irresistibly, it seems to have subjugated the European hearth. It is terrible to think of how much pleasure as well as profit the world would have been deprived if the cat's career had been cut prematurely short. Most fortunate was it, as Hehn remarks, that its introduction preceded those epochs in which its associations with idolatry might have caused it to fall a victim to the fanaticism of Islam or the asceticism of Christianity.

Good Advice.

"About to make a trip to Europe, eh?"

"Yes; and as you are an old traveler, I thought I would ask you what is good for sea-sickness."

"There's only one thing that will prevent it. I know this, for I have crossed the ocean seventeen times."

"What is that?" eagerly.

"Just before buying your ticket, take a dose of strychnine."

THE TARIFF.

Not "For Revenue Only," But Also for Protection and Development.

An Able and Thoughtful Paper by Senator George F. Edmunds, of Vermont.

[From Harper's Magazine.]

It is not true, as I understand history, that in any instance a protective tariff has been inaugurated and put in operation for the benefit of any privileged class whatever. These systems of legislation have, it is believed, always been put in operation for the general development of the resources and the encouragement of the industries of the countries that have resorted to them, whatever in some instances may have been the motive, as distinguished from the purpose and effect, of such laws. The one instance of Great Britain may be taken as a fair example of all, although from a protective tariff country she has come in the course of two centuries to a very large degree to be a so-called free-trade country.

When her system of protection began she was (as our own country is now) in a large degree a rural country, with mines enough and fields enough, and in general with every other resource sufficient to feed and find employment for the whole of her population; and it was her policy to provide by her customs and navigation laws that every one of her natural resources and all of her inhabitants should find development, labor, and with one thrift an increase of wealth. The only differences in situation among her people were purely internal and conventional, or were the natural ones that must exist in all countries until we have anarchy and chaos; that is to say, one person might be the owner of land, another the owner of a mine, and the third of a water-power, and a fourth a merchant, and a fifth a feudal lord, and so on. If all these could be induced by legislation to supply each other with the necessaries and comforts of life without resorting to foreign aid, which must be paid for, it was thought certain that the general average of wealth and development must necessarily increase, and with it the individual prosperity of all her people, so far as individual prosperity could depend upon industry, economy, and thrift. There was nothing in her general system of customs and navigation that favored one class of her people at the expense of another, for the laws applied equally to them all, until in respect of her colonies she adopted another and fatal policy. Her laws commercial were not calculated to build up, nor did they build up or tend to build up, an aristocracy either of land, power, or money in favor of one body of her people as against another. The aristocracy of land, as it may be called, was not a consequence of this system, but it existed before it, and it is clear that it would have continued to exist to a much larger degree than it does now had it not been for the very system of protection she so early adopted and so long continued, and that she has now, with the same purpose of protecting and advancing her interests, partly abolished. With the increase of her general wealth, distributed among a great number of persons, came the distribution of her lands into the hands of a greatly increased number of people; and just in proportion as the general diffusion of wealth increased the independence of her middle and lower classes increased also, and the domination of the great land-holders diminished in the same proportion.

Through the long period of her protective system for production, manufacture, trade, and navigation, it will not be disputed by any one that, in spite of the enormous waste both of life and treasure in wars, her wealth as a nation, the development of all her natural resources, the improvement of the condition of all classes of her people, and her population, increased enormously, so that in later and still recent days her condition, as it respected the necessity or even desirability of continuing the strictness of her customs and navigation laws, has passed away. She had already become the mistress of the world in manufactures and commerce, and almost so in arms. She had, however, from this very growth, become unable either to feed or clothe her now overabundant population from the products of her own soil, and so, as it was thought, a partial free trade became as naturally her proper policy for the continued prosperity of her people as protection had been before under entirely different conditions, and of course she would then more strongly desire, and could with more plausibility advocate, the abolishing of customs and navigation laws by other countries whose markets her people wished to employ for the sale of their productions, well understanding the error of the idea that seems to be advanced in Mr. Watterson's article, that it is the consumer who bears the whole burden of impost duties, and well understanding the fact that, at the very least, a very heavy proportion of such imposts is borne by the foreign producer or manufacturer. This last-named fact appears to be entirely overlooked by those who advocate great reductions of customs duties as a benefit to the consumer, and as a relief of the consumer from taxation.

If the profits of the foreign manufacturer or producer are essentially diminished by customs duties, and are essentially increased by the diminution or abolition thereof, then, so far, the money obtained from them is not by taxation of our own people, but by taxation of the foreigner; and if the surplus revenues are to be reduced by the abolition or reduction of the customs duties, so far they are reduced, not for the benefit of our own people, but to the benefit of people of other countries who are the exporters of goods to our markets. This is well illustrated by our experience in the abolition of the duties upon tea and coffee in the year 1872. Before this abolition there had come into the Treasury many millions of dollars a year as duties from these two articles (in 1870-71 there were over twenty-two millions), neither of which was produced in the United States, and so it was supposed that these articles would be cheapened to the consumers, and that no injury could be done to any domestic interest by their abolition. And this was partly true, so far as its direct effect was concerned, but there ceased to come into the common Treasury from fifteen to twenty millions of dollars a year, while the consumers of tea and coffee paid substantially the same or higher prices for these things than they did before, and the net result was that our Treasury gave up to foreign producers and operators that number of millions of money without any advantage whatever to us, except that the Treasury was by that sum depleted. Even in respect of wholesale prices no change can be attributed to the repeal.

The price of tea rose, as did the price of coffee such as is chiefly used by the great mass of the people, though the price of Java coffee was less.

Allowing for all conceivable accidents and incidents of production or trade, it must be apparent that the abolition of the duties upon tea and coffee was substantially purely a benefit to the producer and exporter, and not to ourselves.

But if it be not true that, in respect of things produced in this country, the abolition of duties works no fall in prices to the consumer, it must be because the foreigner may then undersell the home producer and manufacturer and still have a margin of profit. This, of course, means the increased consumption of foreign commodities, and by so much the diminution of the consumption of domestic products and manufactures; and consequently there must be a corresponding diminution of home production and manufactures, or a production that cannot be consumed. What does this mean, and who desires it? Will the iron master or the textile fabric worker, however wealthy, employ as many men and women or pay as high wages as before if his sales are thus diminished? Certainly not. If he does not, what is to become of the people he now employs? Let them leave the occupation to which they have been bred, and "go West" to farming, says the free-trader. If they knew how to do this, and could do it, farm products would largely increase, but where would be the market for these increased farm products? The home market among the manufacturing classes would have been diminished, while the farm products would have increased, and the farm laborer, whether owner or hired, would find for the results of his labor a market already over-stocked, and there would be a general failure of all who were not already independent, and for them a pure stagnation, for there are now produced more farm products than can be sold at much profit in all markets, both domestic and foreign. How could such a course increase the prosperity of the whole people?

But what is the capitalist and where is the monopoly that free-trade is expected to overcome? The capitalist, as such, is, so far as any active effect on social progress or his own is concerned, the most helpless of any member of a community. His capital is simply the saved and stored-up fruit of previous labor, and it is as inert as the metal in the heart of the mountain (or, as the paper-money men might say, as the pulp in a mill) until the brain and the arm of the workman, by whatever name he is called, put it into active motion, and enable it to exert its force by a combination with labor. The day's labor of the workman, whether of brain or pen or muscle, is only turned into capital as wages, be it 50 cents, as may be the average in other countries, or one dollar, as may be the average in this "Trill-ridden" country, and that capital of a day's work is then only useful as it comes into contact with the product of other labor in the form of food, clothing, house, or whatever its possessor may want. On the other hand—and not an adverse but cooperative hand—the labor of man is more than one-half lost unless it has the benefit of capital already accumulated to aid it in its operations. Who can well begin the simplest farm operations—even with free land such as our country gives to every citizen honestly desiring to work it—or open a mine, or build a mill, without some capital, the stored-up fruits of previous effort? And if the laborers of a country seized all the capital, and the "liberty of anarchy" had its wish for a day, the unchangeable law would remain the same, and the relations of labor done, which is capital, and labor to be done, would be just what they were before. The argument, therefore, that the accumulation of capital is injurious to the interests of the workingman is destructive of all personal liberty and the right of personal advancement. It puts the lazy and the vicious on the same footing (or better) as the industrious, honest, and economical. The one class take what they have not earned, and the other lose what their labor has achieved.

The disturbance of the occupations of labor in the United States would affect a great, very great, proportion of our inhabitants. There are, in round numbers, now engaged in agriculture, 8,000,000; engaged in professional and personal service—justly embracing, as the census puts it, lawyers, doctors, and the hired help of every domestic kind in one class—5,000,000; engaged in trade and transportation, 2,000,000; engaged in manufactures and mechanical industries, 4,000,000; a total of 19,000,000.

This total represents in families a number not less than 30,000,000 directly dependent upon agricultural pursuits, and not less than 14,000,000 dependent upon manufacturing and mechanical pursuits. If, then, by importing more of the products of foreign labor, we diminish the consumption of the products of home labor, we would shorten not only the total wages upon which 14,000,000 of our people subsist, but also the earnings upon which 30,000,000 of food, etc., producing citizens, who now supply their wants from the wages earned in manufacturing and mechanics, depend. The probable outcome of such a step ought to appall every working man, and every capitalist, and all others who desire the welfare of all the people of their country.

If the whole internal revenue system were abolished except the tax on national banks, and the customs laws were left substantially as they are, the revenues would be diminished to the point (and perhaps below) of the absolute necessities of the government, and we should have only in force the system of collecting revenues that existed before the war of the rebellion, and with "the restored harmony of the States" would be restored to them the right to deal with whisky and tobacco, and all social questions growing out of their production and use, untrammeled and unembarrassed by the interference of national law or the army of internal revenue agents. Everybody must agree that the money raised by the internal revenue system is a tax, and entirely a tax, upon the people and industries of the United States, which, as has been shown, is not the case with the customs revenues; and if any tax can be said to be direct and discriminative which is based upon a selection of particular home products to bear the burden which is not imposed upon other home products, it is this, and upon the just theory of equality in taxation upon property as such it cannot be defended. It is true that it is feared by many politicians, who look with a just and natural eye to the temper and sentiment of the people in their respective States, that a repeal of the tax on whisky would not be popular in those communities and States where prohibition or other means of repressing or restraining the traffic in alcoholic drinks prevail; but it is believed this is an error, and that on reflection the people of the strongest prohibition communities would be satisfied that such a step would be of advantage to their cause. While the laws of Congress do not purport to interfere with the police powers of the States in regard to this subject, they certainly have had no tendency to diminish either the production or consumption of liquors, and they do recognize the manufacture of and traffic in them as a lawful and tolerable occupation even in States denouncing the same traffic as a crime. Under the wise and necessary separation of the powers of Congress under the Constitution from those of the respective States, every internal social question was left with the States themselves, to be judged of and dealt with according to their own sense of propriety. Certainly, apart from the sentiment of deriving a revenue from an occupation or a commodity injurious to the public welfare, neither the cause of prohibition nor that of repression has been in any manner advanced by the internal tax upon whisky; and on moral grounds the prohibitionist would hardly felicitate himself upon sharing the profits of a business he believed to be totally wrong and deserving of extirpation. If, upon grounds of sound political economy, the internal-revenue tax ought to be abolished, members of Congress need not hesitate to do their duty from fear of an adverse sentiment on the part of some of their constituents. This path to a radical reduction of revenue is plain, the way easy, and the result certain. No industrial interest, whether of agriculture, of manufactures, or of commerce, can be injured by it, and if the income of the Government should thus fall somewhat below its present rate of expenditure, there would be a very wholesome incentive to a rigid economy in all branches of the public service, and perhaps an introduction of that real reform which has recently been so much preached about and so little practiced.

What the Republican Party Is.

The Republican party was never intended to be, and has never claimed to be, the party of the poor against the rich, or of the laborers against the employers, or of the people against the corporations. It holds that poor and rich have both a vital interest in good government; that laborers and employers both have need of a defensive national policy which promotes the welfare of both, and that people and corporations both have a right to demand from their government no favoritism, but even-handed justice. The Republican party has from the first been, in fact, controlled in a great degree by practical workingmen who form a majority of its members. But it has honestly striven to do equal justice as a trustee of power for the whole people. Many times it has failed, but it has so far succeeded that the growth and prosperity of the country since this party shaped the policy of the Government have been unequaled in any age or country. It does not dishonestly pretend to be the party of labor, and at the same time vote against protecting labor.—New York Tribune.

OPPOSING CLEVELAND.

Hill and Randall Movements Significant of Democratic Dissatisfaction with the President.

[New York special.]

The first little cloud of opposition to President Cleveland's renomination has appeared in Pennsylvania and New York. It is not larger than a man's hand, but it has set all the politicians gossiping. Mr. Randall's friends in Pennsylvania apparently were worsted in their contest with the Federal officials, but in New York the battle is an acknowledged good draw. Under the surface of things both Samuel J. Randall and Governor Hill may be seen in the attitude of Presidential candidates. There is a suspicion abroad that the Pennsylvania and New York affairs are the beginning of a great movement to defeat Mr. Cleveland's renomination, the general plan of which is to divide and conquer. Over a month ago one of the closest friends and political managers of Governor Hill, talking in the Hoffman House, where the Governor was a guest, made this remark: "Suppose three or four candidates for the Democratic Presidential nomination should spring up in different parts of the country just on the eve of the convention, and following on the heels of the public disapproval of the President's free-trade message, would not the result be either to scare Mr. Cleveland off or defeat him?"

He was asked to answer his own inquiry, and added: "If you will take what I say as a hint, rather than as having any authority, I will tell you what I mean. The entire Democratic party is honeycombed with disfavor toward the administration. In nothing is that so clearly demonstrated as in the acquiescence in favor of Mr. Cleveland's renomination. There are no avowed candidates in the field on whom to rally the opposition. It is so easy to break away from Mr. Cleveland any time before the convention that politicians find it convenient to announce themselves as favoring the administration, thereby avoiding all dispute and discussion. You need not be surprised, however, if on the very eve of the convention, you find that Governor Hill is a candidate, that Speaker Carlisle is a candidate, that Mr. McDonald is a candidate, and possibly others. The excuse their friends will give for putting them in the field will be that they wish to have them in line for 1892, but as a fact the effort will be made to divide Mr. Cleveland's forces by presenting a number of favorite sons, and to break him down piece-meal."

"Is Governor Hill a tariff man?"

"He is not a free-trader, and he will oppose anything that squints toward free trade."

Another view of the Hill movement is that which fell from the lips of a well-known New York politician to-day. "Governor Hill probably intends to dictate his own terms," said he. "It is for that reason that he wants the State committee and party machinery. At any rate he does not intend that Edward Cooper shall capture it for Mayor Hewitt, who would possibly like to be Governor, and President also. I do not think that Governor Hill is a candidate for the Presidential nomination. He could not defeat President Cleveland if he should try, but he can dictate terms."

VILAS GIVEN A SCORING.

Senator Plumb on the Late Postoffice Administration—Wretched Service in Order to Make Possible a Claim of Economy.

[Washington special.]

Senator Plumb on Monday told some truths about the Administration's Postoffice Department which will not be relished by Mr. Vilas, though he cannot gainsay the facts. The Kansas Senator is an incisive talker, and when setting forth the grievances of his constituents he is not apt to spare any one's feelings. What he said Monday afternoon had the more force from the Democratic evidence and the personal knowledge of Congressmen. Vilas has few friends among the Democratic Senators, and privately they were not displeased that some of his humbuggery should be shown up. Senator Plumb prefaced his remarks by offering a resolution instructing the Postoffice Committee to inquire into the cause of the inefficient mail service, especially in the West and Southwest, and presented newspaper extracts and letters to show the "demoralized" conditions of the service in Kansas—the result of a "stupid attempt to make a record of economy." He first had read an extract from an Atchison paper telling how the people of that locality were suffering from the inefficiency of the postal service. Then he blandly remarked that this might be called a partisan complaint, and he proposed to show that the people of Kansas were damning the postoffice management without regard to party or politics. In proof of this he had read an article from the Abilene Gazette, a simon-pure Democratic paper, which made no bones of rebuking the management of the Postoffice Department. It alleged that the grievances of the Kansas people were almost unbearable and loudly called on the Administration for a decent postal service. Several instances of outrageously bad service were quoted by Senator Plumb, who told his colleagues facts about Kansas which they knew to be equally true of their own States. The "very estimable gentleman lately at the head of the Postoffice Department" was often referred to and also some of his tricks at economy. He said that the late Postmaster General had seemed to be possessed of a frantic effort to make both ends meet, and that he had, in that effort, deprived the people of what they always had had until within a short period of time. The postal service in the West had got to that point where its condition was absolutely unbearable. A passing allusion was made to some of Vilas' self-glorification.

A Two-third Vote.

The senior deacon presided. The meeting was colored. It was a new pastor they wanted to elect. Brown was the senior deacon's candidate, but the first ballot stood: Jones, 22; Brown 13. The senior deacon was not pleased. With brilliant resolution he pronounced the ballot informal, and the hat went around again. The proceeding seemed high-handed, but the brethren voted. The vote stood: Jones, 21; Brown, 14. "Brother Brown is elected," said the senior deacon. The dissatisfaction was obvious. The senior deacon, with the genius of a Napoleon of finance, grabbed the predicament: "Brethren, you haven't studied the Constitution. Doesn't a two-thirds vote elect? Isn't 14 just two-thirds of 21?" What Senator Chandler proposes by his Congressional elections bill for South Carolina, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Florida is to prevent the senior deacons of Bourbondom running in such deplorable arithmetic as this upon the unsuspecting and unprotesting colored voters of those four states, where they are entitled to representation they never receive.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

News for Cleveland from Georgia.

There are 117 newspapers in the State of Georgia, and all but four of them are in favor of the repeal or modification of the internal revenue laws. It is to be hoped that a few marked copies of these journals will be sent to President Cleveland in time to prevent him from repeating the assertion in his recent message to the effect that the taxes imposed by such laws are not burdensome, and that there is no demand for their removal or reduction.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

WHAT THE LESSON TEACHES.

Lord, how often. It is the worldly spirit that reckons by numbers. Presently we shall hear of a young man who, when our Lord told him to keep the commandments, answered quite significantly, "Which?" As if Christianity were the mere observance of rules and regulations, a mere calculation in addition and subtraction. The heathen of the West Indies fasten their prayers to a wheel or to the flanges of a wind-mill, that it may pray them "a myriad prayers" in its unconscious revolutions. The Chinaman makes a dart of his petition and casts it at the target. If it stick, it is answered; if it fall to the earth, it is in vain. Shall we be no better than the heathen?

Till seven times? The sacred number, and named in a pious frame. Doubtless Peter thought he was putting it pretty high, and it was a large advance upon the Jewish reckoning. Forgive once, twice, three times, said the Jew, then stay from forgiving. Peter ventured to add four more trials and then waited anxiously for our Lord's answer: "Not until seven times." "There!" perhaps Peter exclaims to himself, "I was too fast; I named too large a figure." Christ goes on, "But until seventy times seven." Ah, the number of indefinite extension! The disciple is surprised; so has the world been ever since. Christ introduced a wholly new principle, total and complete forgiveness. "I can forgive, but I cannot forget," we say. Yes, "seven times," but not "seventy times seven." Peter's piety rather than Christ's.

Take account of his servants. Depend upon it, the books of God are accurately kept. Day-ledger, credit-book, inventory—we are in account with God. How much owest thou? Our creditor gives us a book in which he sets down, for our monthly perusal, it may be, the state of our indebtedness to him. The Bible is our book of account with God. It is in large degree a transcript of our standing in the heavens; if we read it aright. Well for us, if we watch our account. God keeps it, and his eye never slumbers nor sleeps.

Which owed him ten thousand talents. An enormous debt, $10,000,000, they tell us, in our money. It is meant to represent an overwhelming amount of liabilities. Does it not clearly set forth man's relation to God? Sin is a debt. Christ emphasized it when at Simon's table. We are living on the bounty of another. Every day, every moment, every breath we draw, we increase our obligations; we are debtors, every one, and that whether we acknowledge it or no. When the richest American of his day, as Theodore Cuyler has said, lay upon his dying bed, the song he chose to have sung as most applicable to his case was the familiar verse, "Come, ye sinners, poor and needy."

He had not to pay. He was insolvent, a virtual bankrupt. It was a thing more easily discovered in those days than now. More readily known a century or more ago, when the prison was built roomy enough to hold debtors. Benjamin Franklin's employer, the printer, we read, interrupted his business three or four times to take up his temporary residence in the city jail for failure to meet commercial dues. We have a way of hiding it for a season now, but not for long. After awhile the crash comes, and, as in the case of the notorious Fidelity failure in Cincinnati, it is all the worse for the delay. In our transactions with God, how stands the account? Are we able of ourselves to meet it? If we are beggars before him, the sooner we confess it the better.

I will pay thee all. Not to be forced in interpretation. It does not mean work righteousness; unless, indeed, the whole institution of Judaism was work righteousness. It means simply repentance, which makes meet for forgiveness. It represents the attitude of Israel over and over again, when in answer to the cry of the prophets the people returned to the Lord and His statutes. It represents, too, the estate of every sinner when he approaches God. It is, in much of ignorance, but also in much of meekness, asking along with patience pardon. "Because thou desiredst me," the Lord presently said. Come thus desirous. Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner, a debtor.

Loosed him and forgave him. It was God's answer. It was the only way the king in this case could "have patience" and show "compassion," for lo, the servant had nothing to pay. Or rather was not that utter prostration of himself in itself all the payment he could make? His self surrender and humiliation were his declaration of bankruptcy. And will heaven's court be less kindly than earth's?

"All the fitness he requireth
Is to feel your need of him."

The same servant went out. And a good piece out, we might say. A long way from the atmosphere of that compassion; and yet he was a servant still, beholden to the same master. He goes out and forgets it all. Too often, as our pious audiences end, our good thoughts end. Too often, as we go out from the Lord's sanctuary, the word of the Lord goes out from our minds and hearts. Have we been forgiven? Remember, it gives us no prerogative of lordship over others. Keep humble. You are a servant still, the same servant whom the Lord forgave.

An hundred pence. Twenty-five dollars, shall we call it? Set it over against the $10,000,000, it is as nothing. We go forth from the Lord's chamber of mercy overwhelmed with his generous compassion. We come out into the small shops of our human dealings into the sphere of the "hundred pence." Here is some one who has injured in some degree our business. It is an hundred pence. Some one has spoken ill of us—an hundred pence. Some one has insulted us or failed to oblige us—an hundred pence. Some one has passed us by without speaking or has failed to call—an hundred pence. Oh, brother or sister, look up at the cross-mark on your $10,000,000 debt. How paltry and pitiful the "hundred pence!"

Pay me that thou owest. The scene has, indeed, greatly changed. The servant has gone out and laid hands on an under-servant who owes him in turn, and, without this time stopping to reckon with him, seizes him by the throat with a demand for liquidation. Ah, now we are on familiar ground as earth's inhabitants. We hear the familiar sound of the market place. Assuredly the voice is still to be caught, though in disguised tones, in the trafficking affairs of men. But most of all do we witness such scenes and hear such voices in our social, family, and even churchly relations. Look about and listen. There are too many hands at other men's throats, too many harsh voices saying variously, "Pay me what thou owest."

His fellow-servant. Significant word. Let it not be forgotten. We are fellow-servants. We are fellow-debtors. There is none righteous, no, not one. How it should bring us together in love and in charity! How tender and long suffering it should make us toward each other! "Move along," whispered the sexton to the tattered stranger at the altar, "this is the Duke of Wellington." "Let him alone," said Wellington, "we are all alike here."

And he would not. Then would not God! Remember the prayer, "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors." But, some one says, he was already forgiven. So are we, who are taught as Christian brethren to lift this Lord's prayer. We are given no such indulgence and immunity as that we can exercise a spirit wholly alien to the kingdom of Christ and yet, by a sort of magic talisman, hold our place in it. Such a stand, deliberately and determinedly taken, is proof sufficient that we are not of Christ, for that we have not his spirit. We may still be called Christian, but he only is Christian who acts Christianly.

From your hearts. That helps us all. Whether men will allow us or not, whether they will hear us or not, we can, before God and from our hearts, forgive. So did the martyrs at the stake, looking upon their tormentors. So did One of old who, ere it was finished, cried out: "Father, forgive them." God keep those words ringing still!

So likewise. Let us not miss the application. It stands over against the door of every one of us. The fearful, "Inasmuch as ye have done it not," looks us as squarely in the face as does the "Inasmuch as ye have done it." The so likewise is entirely as men receive or reject Christ's spirit of meekness.

The Local Option Election.

Returns indicate that Charlevoix county at the recent election went against the saloons by about 700 majority, with a little more than half the vote cast.

The result shows unmistakably that public sentiment is not to be trifled with on this question, and that not only the open saloons must close at the proper time, but that evasions of the law will not be tolerated.

We think we see in the result a healthy and robust opinion that whiskey is an evil and an expensive one, that there is no feature of its hideous existence that deserves apology or defense.

There are croakers, who, now that the first step is taken, predict stumbling blocks and quagmires and quicksands in the way of steps yet remaining to be taken; who suggest this way of evasion and that, and who utter prophesy of failure.

This is not a time for that kind of talk. Let the people see to it at the proper time that the law is enforced. Let every village in Charlevoix county pay the same attention to its enforcement that they do to their other business interests. Any corporate village has power to enact ordinances which will prove a sharp thorn in the side of those who seek to violate the law by "drinking clubs" or "cold tea" resorts—a class of dens that do more sin than double their number of licensed saloons.

Make it hot for them!

Congress is to investigate the Pennsylvania coal strikes. Then will come a majority and minority double-barreled report. This strike will be dead and buried and another gray headed before a congressional committee completes its work.

The Dakota Territorial Superintendent of Public Instruction proposes to compile a complete list of those who perished in Dakota during the fatal snow storm of Jan. 12. The statistics are being gathered by county superintendants of schools.

Michigan crops report for February issued at Lansing Friday, reports, from 890 correspondents, that wheat went through January uninjured, protected by an average depth of eight inches in the southern part of the State, and twenty-seven in the northern part. Since August 1st, 28 per cent of the wheat crop has been marketed; 547,640 bushels were marketed in January, and 6,435,789 bushels are on hand in mills and elevators.

At a swell Democratic dinner down at Norfolk one of the orators said: "Why, the wool industry is a very small affair, and affects only a small section of the country." There are, according to statistics, 45,000,000 sheep sheep in the United States, and the wool crop brought in last year $68,400,000. This was distributed to a great many different pockets, and when the owners get to voting Democratic orators may not think it "is a very small affair."

The high license law adopted in Chicago in 1882 seems to have an encouraging effect. The population of the city is estimated to have increased 300,000, and the total number of saloons has decreased about 1,000 in the same time. All of which tends to show that high licence is the only practical method of regulating the liquor traffic. It can be made prohibitory in country districts, and is the most practical system yet devised that will keep the traffic within bounds in the larger cities.

The $8,000 worth of useless apparatus at present stored in the city hall building should satisfy the aldermen that it does not pay to buy things simply because they are cheap.

Stillman Parker is making arrangements to build a schooner about the size of the Fleetwing.

Bets are being made at St. Ignace that the first boat will arrive there on or before the 18th of April.

There is good demand for vessels of the Welland canal size, and other craft which are now considered small carriers in the grain, coal and ore trades. These vessels are wanted principally for the lumber and cedar trade, which promises well for the future.

Milwaukee Wisconsin: It is said that at the close of the season of 1888 J. H. Pauley intends to dismantle one of his Chesapeake Bay iron steamers and convert the hull into a tow barge. The steamer in question is probably the Roanoke, as her boiler will need extensive repars after the coming season. It is also reported that Mr. Pauley intends to place the Roanoke's engine, which is a fine one of the condensing order, together with a new boiler, in a wooden hull that he will have built either here or at Manitowoc.

The Wonderful Extent to Which It is Carried on in this City—An Old and Respected Concern.

[illegible] of the leading features of the city of Rochester for many years. Many of the present firms began business in a very modest way, but have since developed into some of the leading manufacturers in the country. So extensive is the industry carried on here that a very large per cent of the city's inhabitants are supported by it. Good hands can get plenty of work and demand a fair compensation for their labor. One of the oldest firms here engaged in the clothing trade is that of Messrs. Michael Kolb & Son. This concern was established thirty-four years ago by the senior member of the firm, and has enjoyed a wonderfully successful career. They have for many years occupied their large building on North St. Paul street, but for want of more room and improved facilities with which to better prosecute their extensive business they have resolved to erect a fine large building in the spring, consisting of six stories above ground, two basements, and with a frontage of seventy two feet. The structure is to be an imposing one and an ornament to the city, and one of which its owners may justly feel proud. As a further evidence of the clothing manufacturers, Mr. Kolb states that quite a number are contemplating building their own houses, which will occur during the present year. In this respect, however, he does not propose to be outdone. The business with this house for the past year has been all that could be desired. Sales have been larger, collections easy, and their books show a decided increase over the year preceding The outlook for the present is even more flattering than it has been for many years past. Although they manufacture a general line of goods their specialty consists of a fine grade. In these they are not surpassed, the strictest attention being paid to every detail, and none but the most skilled hands are employed in their manufacture. As a guarantee of the most thorough workmanship and finish being given to goods turned out of this house, it may be stated that the senior member of the firm, Mr Michael Kolb, devotes his whole and undivided attention to the manufacturing department of the establishment, he having been a practical man in the manufacturing of clothing, and is eminently fitted to fill so important and responsible a position. His son, Mr Jacob M. Kolb, attends to the business on the road. In connection with their manufacturing they also do an extensive jobbing trade, but principally in fine goods. With a long and honorable career this firm has established a demand for their goods in almost every State in the Union, enjoy the most implicit confidence and esteem of all with whom they have dealings. [Mr. George W. Miller, the popular clothier of Charlevoix, Mich., deals extensively with this firm.]

At 5 p. m. Sunday a tremendous cyclone struck the town of Mt. Vernon, Ill. The cyclone entered the town at the public square, and did terrible havoc 500 yards wide, blowing down some of the best blocks and residences. The town took fire in many places, and much damage and confusion took place. In half an hour all was over, and 35 people were found dead, and 350 injured.

The State military camps will not go to Mackinac. The officer who went there to see about it says: "The fact is a few army cows, a couple of Government mules and two or three emaciated horses stand in the way of the encampment being held there. You see, Senator Stockbridge has given us permission to use any and all land and property on the island that he owns, and he has a clear field that is admirably suited for the camp, but there is not enough of it and the ground is not exactly of the right kind for good drilling and parade grounds. The Government owns a twenty-acre field near the proposed camp ground, which is just the thing for drilling and parade, and this is under the control of Capt. Goodale, who commands the regular troops in the fort. When we visited the island last fall we supposed that the State Troops would be assisted in every way by the officers of the regular army, and we were led to believe that we would be royally welcomed. Yesterday, however, when we asked Capt. Goodale if the twenty-acre field could be used for drilling and parade, he said that the troops could parade there, but inasmuch as that field was the only place the fort had to pasture the cattle, it would be highly objectionable to use the field for drilling, as the boys marching back and forth would trample down all the grass. If we can surmount the live stock difficulty by hiring another pasture or by donating a ton of hay to take the place of grass, we camp on the Island. The Government ground is the only place on the Island suitable for drilling, and if we cannot get it we shall look elsewhere for a location. Later.—Adjutant General D. B. Ainger says the state military board has practically decided to hold the next encampment at Mackinac. The board will probably formally decide upon the location at the next meeting.

—There are a good many who talk of the protracted absence of President Cherrie as auguring evil to the railroad project, and a few go so far as to attribute to him deception and chicanery in the matter. In the first place, money does not grow upon the trees in Madison Square, New York. Secondly, we are willing to concede that the President of the D. C. & E. R. R. Co. is working in the interest of the Pine Lake Iron Co., and we congratulate Northern Michigan upon the fact. It is fortunate for us that we have with us a concern of such magnitude that a railroad is necessary to its successful operation. Mr. Cherrie wants a railroad worse than any of the rest of us, and we know him well enough to bet that he will have it if pluck and push will secure it. R. M. Cherrie is no spring chicken. Don't let this fact slip your memory.

—The Deputy Game and Fish Warden on Thursday arrested Jacob Quick, of East Jordan, while catching speckled trout through the ice at the mouth of the Jordan river. He attempted to escape, but was captured and taken before Justice Barber, at East Jordan, and admitted to bail for trial the next morning at 10. He demanded a jury trial, and the result was a disagreement, notwithstanding the fact that the guilt of the defendant was clearly proven—five standing for acquittal and one for conviction. Prosecuting Attorney Corbett appeared for the People, and Messrs. Fogg, Burnham and Keat for the defendant. Comment is unnecessary. One or two things, however, may be stated. The State of Michigan will stop illegal fishing at Jordan river, and the next case will not be tried at East Jordan. It should also be remembered that evidence of possession of speckled trout out of season will convict under the law before an impartial jury. Although slightly disfigured, the Warden is still in the ring, and good for another engagement.

A BAD PREACHER.

Another Interesting Chapter in the Career of "Rev." J. L. Morgan, Formerly of Atwood.

Our readers doubtless remember the exposure of "Rev." John L. Morgan a few years ago. Morgan was pastor on trial at Atwood, Antrim county, and his detection in conduct unministerial, to say the least, led to his dismissal and disgrace. He was a scholar and eloquent preacher, but a plagiarist—committing to memory the sermons of noted divines, and electrifying his hearers by his pulpit oratory. The polished scoundrel has again come to grief.

The following concerning this same gay Lothario is from the Chicago Daily News:

"A telegram from St. Louis on Tuesday said that the Rev. John L. Morgan, pastor of the Cheltenham Congregational church in that city, left suddenly about five weeks ago, ostensibly to go to Chicago for his wife and children. Nothing has since been heard from him and the church members are feeling somewhat anxious, especially, as Mr. Morgan took with him about $300 which had been collected for building a new church. The telegram also credited Mr. Morgan with having been formerly connected with Dr. Moody's church in Chicago.

"Inquiry among leading Congregational ministers in this city failed to elicit any knowledge of Morgan himself or his alleged disappearance and defalcation. Cheltenham Congregational church is one of the new suburban parishes in St. Louis, and the general impression among clergymen in that denomination here that Mr. Morgan is a new man from some other state.

"The Rev. Dr. Goss being absent from the city, a reporter called on Mr. Hitchcock, of the Y. M. C. A. bureau, a prominent member of Mr. Moody's church. 'I think it must be the same,' said Mr. Hitchcock, after reading the telegram. 'About a year and a half ago a man named Morgan, who said he was of Welsh birth, came to Chicago and began to attend the Chicago Avenue church. He applied for work, and told several different stories about himself. I had occasion to look up his record and found that he had been preaching in Manistee, where he also ran a marble yard. He got into trouble with a female member of his flock, [Undoubtedly the Atwood episode is meant.] and afterward went to Adair, Iowa, where he also preached. The same trouble occurred there, and he had to leave the place. He came to Chicago, and while here worked part of the time in a north side marble yard. He was anxious to get church work to do, and he probably would have been employed but for his record. He was never admitted to membership in the Chicago Avenue church, but attended the services regularly for about a year, and occasionally took part in the meetings. He was well educated and a fluent talker on religious subjects. About six months ago a Presbyterian clergyman sent Morgan out to some town in the interior of the state to conduct the Sabbath services The people were so much pleased with him that arrangements were made for him to return to the same church the following Sunday. Morgan came back to Chicago, but when the second Sunday came around he was in the lockup, having given way to intoxication. After his release he disappeared, and this is the first I have heard of him since. Morgan left a wife and family in Chicago, but I think the couple had separated owing to the man's bad habits.'"

Morgan was well known in Charlevoix, and on one occasion delivered a temperance lecture in the M. E. church. The address was a most brilliant effort, and was afterwards proven to be a brazen plagiarism upon the work of a noted public speaker. His memory was prodigious.

Historical Society.

The large number which gathered in the parlors of Mr. and Mrs. Levi Blanchard last Friday evening, clearly manifests the continued interest in the meetings. The following programme was presented by the Executive Committee: Instrumental solo by Misses Luna Washburne and Carrie Hilton; vocal solo by Miss Gray; select readings, Mesdames Downs and Enos; paper, "The Reign of James I," by Mr. Byron See; the conversation, "Scott's Fortunes of Nigel," led by O. S. Washburn and Miss Flora Nelson. The next meeting will be held with Mr. and Mrs. H. Lee Iddings. The paper on Charles I, to be read by Dr. Carlstein: W. A. Brown and Miss Esther Buttars will lead the conversation on "Woodstock."

"It is a home market," says John Sherman, "that gives employment, life, strength, health, wealth and comfort to the people of the United States."

The Stolen Fortune

CHAPTER XVIII.

DAN LE FANE, or Iron Dan, as he was called by his men and companions in the wild life he had been leading, carried Nora to his former rendezvous and left her well and, as he supposed, securely guarded, and started once more for North Platte, going at first to Cheyenne, and from thence by the cars to the latter place.

Here one morning he entered his attorney's office, much to his surprise.

"Have you made any arrangements in regard to the herds?" was his first query.

"No, Mr. LeFane; the very afternoon I expected to bring Mr. Gray around, you both suddenly disappeared."

"Both?"

"Yes. I understood he started off in search of Miss Fairleigh, who, it seems, is still mysteriously missing. I've an idea the young fellow is more than half in love with her."

"Indeed!" scornfully replied Dan; "and that young tenderfoot started off alone after her, did he? He'll come back udmus hair, perhaps, if he comes back at all."

"Oh, he'll turn up by and by. No, he did not go alone; the old scout, Rube Smith, accompanied him."

"Ah, that alters the case. Pray, when did they start?"

"About nightfall, I believe; but really I do not know. I suppose you have heard nothing from the girl?"

"Nothing whatever. I suppose you would advise me to wait until Mr. Gray returns before I look up another purchaser."

"Yes; he's young and green and enthusiastic over the business. It would be to your advantage to wait on him."

"Very well, then, we will proceed to other matters."

After another hour Dan left his lawyer's office and took the train back to Cheyenne.

"I must hasten back and let the boys know that old Rube is on their trail. The girl must be moved to other quarters at once. A sleuth-hound cannot follow a trail more surely than old Rube can. I was a fool, perhaps, to carry off the girl, but she's derned pretty, and I still fear may have some legal hold upon Richard Farleigh's wealth. Since Isabel won't relent or forgive the past, I don't know who would suit me better than little Nora—bless her fair face—and yet there is a resemblance in it that puzzles me. What a funny old lady that is on my right; snowy hair, glasses, and how neatly her hands are gloved; denced small, shapely hands for so old a lady: something about her rather odd, but I can't tell just what it is."

So, musing as the train sped onward in night-time gloom, Dan Le Fane fell asleep, his head resting upon the back of his seat.

When he awoke he found the old lady had disappeared, and that his destination was reached. He also found pinned to the seat in front of him the same well-drawn picture of himself with a party of vigilantes ready to hang him.

He snatched up the picture, glanced keenly about him, and seeing no suspicious persons he hurriedly left the car.

"Strange who this unknown enemy and artist can be. Seems to think I'll come to the proper end, and is very anxious to let me know it. This having an enemy in the dark is not very pleasant. I can fight an open one. I am at a loss to deal with one in secret."

And as he walked away from the depot he saw the flutter of the old lady's shawl—the prim, trim-looking old lady he had noticed in the cars; but he little dreamed that her hand drew his likeness so accurately, and her hand pinned it just where his glance was sure to fall upon awakening, or that she was his deadly enemy, silent as death, but pitiless, and day and night hunting him to his doom.

In a short time he had mounted Black Joe, and was riding away in the placed it at Black Joe's head, shut his eyes, and fired. With a groan the noble horse fell over on his side, quite dead.

CHAPTER XIX.

AS Nora began to realize that her old, devoted servant stood before her she sprang forward joyously and seized his hand in both her own, her eyes full of happy tears.

"Skete, dear old Skete! then you are alive! you did not perish in the flames!"

"La, no, Miss Nora, honey. Skete all right; but whar—how you come here?" dropping his voice to a whisper and drawing her gently back to a dark corner.

"I was out in the mountains riding. I became lost and wandered on until I fell in with a party of hunters. They were soon joined by Dan Le Fane."

"Dan Le Fane! what's dat debble doin' here?"

"Oh, Skete, do you know him?—he is so cruel. He robbed me of all papa's money, said and proved that I had no claim to it. Then he joined those rough men and had me brought back here in this dreadful place. Where did you ever see him, Skete?"

"I knew dat ar villain many, many years ago when him an' young Massa Fairleigh was boys togedder. I jus guess Massa Fairleigh hadn't no special call to lub him. I spects he's de bery same chap de boys call Iron Dan, a—a regular bad un, honey, but done you fear, 'cause Skete's around, and Skete's a-goin to sabe Miss Nora or die, Skete am."

"But how came you here?"

"La, Miss Nora, chile, dat am a long story. Jim Gregory, he fust fetched dis yar darky here, and den I runned away, an'—an' de Indians dey grabbed me, an'—an' den I got off from dem, an' den some ob dese yer robber fellers dey cotch me 'gain, an' so, Miss Nora, here I am, thinkin' an' thinkin' how to get away; an' now, honey, I hab to help you. Hush! dar come some one; you go back to your couch an' go to sleep; Skete see you some udder time."

Nora prudently did as he requested, and sank down upon her bed of skins and quietly awaited the approach of Jim Gregory.

"Now, Miss," he begun, in his coarse, heavy voice, "you are not to worry or take on. You'll be treated kind if you take matters easy, but any fuss around here or tryin' to escape will compel us put you in chains. Iron Dan has ordered that we keep you safe at any cost, and, if there is no other way, we will fasten you to the wall here. So I advise you to be quiet. Since Iron

Black Joe suddenly stumbled to his knees.

Dan went away, the boys have brought in your old nigger, Skete, and, if you'll be sort o' reconciled, he kin occasionally keep you company; it may cheer you up a bit. But none o' yer tryin' to escape; these mountains are chock full o' redskins and bears."

With which cheerful intelligence Jim went away, and in a short time Nora was again joined by Skete.

"Miss Nora, honey," he whispered, crouching at her feet, "I hab got something for you."

"What is it, Skete?"

"It's—it's some papers, chile. Massa Fairleigh's papers dat belong to you."

"Papa's papers, but how came you to have charge of them, Skete?"

"It's a long, sad story, Miss Nora, but some day you know all. Massa Fairleigh he say to Skete one day, when you be gone off ridin', 'Skete, you come here. I've a secret to intrust to you, an' if I should die first you'll not forget, will you?'

"'No, massa, Skete remember.'

"'Now, listen; under this stone, near the door, is a small tin box, and in it are valuable papers belonging to Nora; if I should meet with any accident, or die suddenly, you are to go and get them and place them in Nora's hands.'

"'Yes, massa.'

"'Swear it, Skete.'

"Den Massa Fairleigh he make Skete hold up his right hand and swear to do his biddin', an'—an' here dey is, Miss Nora. Skete took 'em out ob de tin box when de robbers in de ranch, wrap 'em in a piece of sheepskin, and keep dem in his breast fur you, all safe. Hide 'em, chile, till you git clar out of dis yar hole."

Nora took the bundle and placed them in her own bosom, wondering good."

"He says that papa was not my father, and that I have no claim to his money or estate, and he himself is the true heir; and, Skete, he has actually taken possession, in the name of the law, of everything."

"Sho now, you don't say so!"

"Yes, and if you know anything about my parents you must tell me. You certainly know that your old 'Massa Fairleigh,' as you call him, was my father."

Still Skete hesitated.

"Tell me what you do know at least; begin at the very first thing you ever knew about me."

"Miss Nora, honey, it am a long story, an'—an' Skete hab to guess—some; but very well, Miss Nora, dis yar all Skete know. Back dar in Virginny, in de ole days——Yes, yes, boss, comin', comin', dis yar bery minute!"

And Skete went hurrying off to answer to the call of Jim Gregory.

What Dreams Are Made Of.

A slight intercostal pain becomes the point of an enemy's dagger, or the bite of an enraged dog.

The sleeper sometimes dreams of his appearing on the street or in society only half-dressed; the innocent cause is found in some of the bedclothes having fallen off.

Difficulty in respiration is fearful agony caused by nightmare, the nightmare seeming to be a weight rolled upon the chest, or a horrible monster which threatens to stifle the sleeper.

Parents and friends cut off in the flower of life ordinarily appear in dreams because of the profound impression which their death or burial has made; hence the general opinion that the dead continue during the night their intercourse with the living.

An inconvenient position of the sleeper, a slight hindrance to respiration or interference with the action of the heart, may be the cause of dreams, where one seeks an object without being able to find it, or has forgotten something in starting on a journey.

Those subjective visual and auditory sensations which are represented in a waking state as a luminous chaos of an obscure visual field, by humming and roaring in the ears, and especially subjective retinal sensations, cause the dreamer to see innumerable birds, butterflies, fish, multi-colored pears, or flowers. But if there be some cutaneous irritation these visions are usually changed into caterpillars or beetles, crawling over the skin of the sleeper.

Beecher's Wisdom.

Every farm should own a good farmer.

A man never has good luck who has a bad wife.

The masses against the classes the world over.

A man who does not love praise is not a full man.

A man must ask leave of his stomach to be a happy man.

It takes longer for man to find out man than any other creature that is made.

A man without self-restraint is like a barrel without hoops, and tumbles to pieces.

Whoever makes home seem to the young dearer and more happy is a public benefactor.

The greatest event in a hen's life is made up of an egg and a cackle. But eagles never cackle.

A proud man is seldom a grateful man, for he never thinks that he gets as much as he deserves.

That cannot be a healthy condition in which few prosper and the great mass are drudges.

Communities are blest in the proportion in which money is diffused through the whole range of population.

Gambling with cards or dice or stocks is all one thing, it is getting money without giving an equivalent for it.

Newspapers are the schoolmasters of the common people. That endless book, the newspaper, is our national glory.

One of the original tendencies of the human mind, fundamental and universal, is the love of other people's private affairs.

This is a good world to sin in, but so far as men are concerned it is a very hard world to repent in. It is a bitter world, it is a cruel world.

Charity.

"Charity! charity! Who has charity to bestow?" cried a rather well-dressed beggar at the corner of State and Randolph streets, in Chicago, last week.

"Charity, my dear sir," said a portly gentleman, who paused for a moment before the crier, "what do you want of charity?"

"I want it to cover up my sins."

"I don't think this will provide much of a mantle of the kind you want, but it may help you drown a few. Here's a quarter."—Chicago Ledger.

Those who are in the habit of indulging in raw onions, says a medical man, may be consoled for the social disadvantages which ensue by the fact that onions are about the best nervine known. No medicine is really so efficacious in case of nervous prostration, as they tone up a worn-out system in a very short time.

WIFELY AMBITION.

Dr. Talmage's Sixth Sermon to the Women of America.

Wives of America Use Your Influence for God and Home—Remember the Story of Jezebel and Ahab and Give Not Bad Advice to Your Husbands.

BROOKLYN, Feb. 12.—In the tabernacle this morning the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D. D., preached the sixth of his series of "Sermons to Women of America with Important Hints for Men." The subject was "Wifely Ambition, Good and Bad," and the text was from 1 Kings, xxi, 7: "Arise, and eat bread, and let thine heart be merry. I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth." Dr. Talmage said:

One day King Ahab, looking out of the window of his palace at Jezebel, said to his wife Jezebel: "We ought to have these royal gardens enlarged. If we could only get that follow Naboth, who owns that vineyard out there, to trade or sell we could make it a kitchen garden for our palace."

"Fetch in Naboth," said the King to one of his servants.

The plain gardener, wondering why he should be called into the presence of his majesty, comes in, a little downcast in his modesty and with very obsequious manner bows to the king.

The King says: "Naboth, I want to trade vineyards with you. I want your vineyard for a kitchen garden, and I will give a great deal better vineyard in place of it, or, if you prefer money for it, I will give you cash."

"Oh no," says Naboth, "I cannot trade off my little place, nor can I sell it. It is the old homestead. I got it of my father and he of his father, and I cannot let the old place go out of my hands."

In a great state of petulancy King Ahab went into the house and flung himself on the bed, and turned his face to the wall in a great pout.

His wife Jezebel comes in and she says: "What is the matter with you? Are you sick?"

"Oh," he says, "I feel very blue. I have set my heart on getting that kitchen garden and Naboth will neither trade or sell, and to be defeated by a common gardner is more than I can stand."

"Oh, pshaw," says Jezebel, "don't go on that way. Get up and eat your dinner and stop moping. I will get for you that kitchen garden."

Then Jezebel borrowed her husband's signet ring or seal, for then, as now, in those lands kings never signed their names, but had a ring with the royal name engraved on it, and that impressed on a royal letter or document was the signature. She stamped her husband's name on a proclamation which resulted in getting Naboth tried for treason against the King, and two perjured witnesses swore their souls away with the life of Naboth, and he was stoned to death, and his property came to the crown, and so Jezebel got for her husband and herself the kitchen garden.

But while the wild street dogs were rending the dead body of poor Naboth, Elijah, the prophet, tells them of other canines that will after a while have a free banquet, saying: "Where dogs lick the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine."

And, sure enough, three years later, Ahab, wounded in battle, his chariot dripping with the carnage, dogs stood under it lapping his life's blood. And a little afterward his wife, Jezebel, who had been his chief adviser, stands at her palace window and sees Jehu, the enemy, approaching to take possession of the palace. And to make herself look as attractive as possible and queenly to the very last, she decorated her person and, according to Oriental custom, closed her eyes and ran a brush dipped in a black powder along the long eyelashes, and then from the window she glared her indignation upon Jehu. As he rode to the gates in his chariot he shouted to the slaves in her room: "Throw her down!" But no doubt the slaves halted a moment from such work of assassination, yet knowing Queen Jezebel could be no more to them and the conqueror Jehu would be everything, as he shouted again, "Throw her down!" they seized her and bore her struggling and cursing to the window casement and hurled her forth till she came tumbling to the earth, striking it just in time to let Jehu's horses trample her and the chariot wheels roll over her. While Jehu is inside refreshing himself after the excitement, he orders his servants to go out and bury the dead Queen. But the wild street dogs had for the third time appeared on the scene, and they removed all her body except those parts which in all ages dogs are by a strange instinct or brutal superstition kept from touching after death—the palms of the hands and the soles of the feet.

All this appalling scene of ancient history was the result of a wife's bad advice to a husband, of a wife's struggle to advance her husband's interests by unlawful means. Ahab and Jezebel got the kitchen garden of Naboth, but the dogs got them. The trouble all began when the mistaken wife aroused her husband out of his melancholy by the words of the text: "Arise, and eat bread, and let thine heart be merry; I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth."

The influence suggested by this subject is an influence you never before heard discoursed on and may never hear again, but a most potent and semi-omnipotent influence, and decides the course of individuals, families, nations, centuries, and eternities. I speak of wifely ambition, good and bad. How important that every wife have her ambition, an elevated, righteous, and divinely approved ambition.

And here let me say, that what I am most anxious for is that woman, not waiting for the rights denied her or postponed, promptly and decisively employ the rights she already has in possession. Some say she shall be in a fair way to get all rights when she gets the right to the ballot-box. I wish that the experiment may be tried and settled. I would like to see all women vote, and then watch the result. I do not know that it would change anything for the better. Most wives and daughters and sisters would vote as their husbands and fathers and brothers voted. Nearly all the families that I know are solidly Republican or Democratic or Prohibition. Those families all voting would make more votes, but no difference in the result. Besides that, as now at the poles men are bought up by the thousands, women would be bought up by the thousands. The more voters, the more opportunity for political corruption. We have several million more voters now than are for public good.

We are told that female suffrage would correct two evils—the rum business and the insufficiency of woman's wages. About the rum business I have to say that multitudes of women drink, and it is no unusual thing to see them in the restaurants so overpowered with wine and beer that they can hardly sit up, while there are many so called respectable restaurants where they can go and take their champagne and hot toddy all alone. Mighty temperance voters those women would make! Besides that, the wives of the rum sellers would have to vote in the interest of their husband's business, or have a time the inverse of felicitous. Besides that, millions of respectable and refined women in America would probably not vote at all, because they do not want to go to the polls, and, on the other hand, womanly roughs would all go to the polls, and that might make woman's vote on the wrong side. There is not, in my mind, much prospect of the expulsion of drunkenness by female suffrage.

As to woman's wages to be corrected by woman's vote, I have not much faith in that. Women are harder on women than men are. Masculine employers are mean enough in treatment of women, but if you want to hear beating down of prices and wages in perfection, listen how some women treat washer-women and dressmakers and female servants. Mrs. Shylock is more merciless than Mr. Shylock. Women, I fear, will never get righteous wages through woman's votes, and as to unfortunate womanhood, women are far more cruel and unforgiving than men are. After a woman has made shipwreck of her character men generally drop her, but women do not so much drop her as hurl her with the force of a catapult clear out and off and down and under.

I have not much faith that women will ever get merciful consideration and justice through woman suffrage, yet I like experiments, and some of my friends in whose judgment I have confidence are so certain that alleviation would come by such process that I would if I had the power, put in every woman's hand the vote. I cannot see what right you have to make a woman to pay taxes on her property to help support city, State, and National Government, and yet deny her the opportunity of helping to decide who shall be Mayor, Governor, or President. But let every wife, not waiting for the vote she may never get, or, getting it, find it outbalanced by some other vote not fit to be cast, arise now in the might of the eternal God and wield the power of a sanctified wifely ambition for a good approximating the infinite.

No one can inspire a man to noble purposes as a noble woman, and no one so thoroughly degrade a man as a wife of unworthy tendencies. While in my text we have illustrations of wifely ambition employed in the wrong direction, society and history are full of instances of wifely ambition gloriously triumphant in right directions. All that was worth admiration in the character of Henry VI. was a reflection of the theories of his wife Margaret. William, Prince of Orange, was restored to the right path by the grand qualities of his wife Mary. Justinian, the Roman Emperor, confesses that his wise laws were the suggestion of his wife Theodora. Andrew Jackson, the warrior and President, had his mightiest re-enforcement in his plain wife, whose inartistic attire was the amusement of the elegant circles in which she was invited. Washington, who broke the chain that held America in foreign vassalage, wore for forty years a chain around his own neck, that chain holding the miniature likeness of her who had been his greatest inspiration, whether among the snows at Valley Forge or amid the honors of the presidential chair. Pliny's pen was driven through all its poetic and historical dominions by his wife Calpurnia, who sang his stanzas to the sound of flute and sat among audiences enraptured at her husband's genius, herself the most enraptured. Pericles said he got all his eloquence and statesmanship from his wife. When the wife of Grotius rescued him from long imprisonment at Lovestein by means of a bookcase that went in and out, carrying his books to and fro, he being one day transported, hidden amid the folios, and the women of besieged Weinberg, getting permission from the victorious army to take with them so much of their valuables as they could carry, under cover of the promise, shouldered and took with them the most important valuables, their husbands—both achievements in a literal way illustrated what thousands of times has been done in a figurative way, that wifely ambition has been the salvation of men.

De Tocqueville, whose writings will be potential and quoted while the world lasts, ascribes his success to his wife, and says: "Of all the blessings which God has given to me, the greatest of all in my eyes is to have lighted on Maria Motley." Martin Luther says of his wife: "I would not exchange my poverty with her for all the riches of Crœsus without her." Isabella of Spain, by her superior faith in Columbus, put into the hand of Ferdinand, her husband, America. John Adams, President of the United States, said of his wife: "She never, by word or look discouraged me from running all hazards for the salvation of my country's liberties." Thomas Carlyle spent the last twenty years of his life in trying by his pen to atone for the fact that during his wife's life he never appreciated her influence on his career and destiny. Alas, that having taken her from a beautiful home and a brilliant career, he should have buried her in the home of a recluse and scolded her in such language as only a dyspeptic genius could manage, until one day while in her invalidism riding in Hyde Park, her pet dog got run over and under the excitement the coachman found her dead. Then the literary giant woke from his conjugal injustice and wrote the lamentations of Craigenputtock and Cheyne Row. The elegant and fulsome epitaphs that husbands put upon their wives' tombstones are often an attempt to make up for lack of appreciative words that should have been uttered in the ears of the living. A whole Greenwood of monumental inscriptions will not do a wife so much good after she has quit the world as one plain sentence like that which Tom Hood wrote to his living wife when he said: "I never was anything till I knew you."

Oh, woman, what is your wifely ambition, noble or ignoble? Is it high social position? That will then probably direct your husband, and he will climb and scramble and slip and fall and rise and tumble, and on what level or in what depth or on what height he will after a while be found I cannot even guess. The contest for social position is the most unsatisfactory contest in all the world, because it is so uncertain about your getting it, and so insecure a possession after you have obtained it and so unsatisfactory even if you keep it. The whisk of a lady's fan may blow it out. The growl of one bear or the bellowing of one bull on Wall Street may scatter it.

Is the wife's ambition the political preferment of her husband? Then that will probably direct him. What a God forsaken realm is American politics those best know who have dabbled in them. After they have assessed a man who is a candidate for office which he does not get, or assessed him for some office attained, and he has been whirled round and round and round and round among the drinking, smoking, swearing crowd who often get control of public affairs, all that is left of his self-respect or moral stamina, would find plenty of room on a geometrical point which is said to have neither length, breadth or thickness. Many a wife has not been satisfied till her husband went into politics but would afterward have given all she possessed to get him out.

I knew a highly moral man, useful in the church, and possessor of a bright home. He had a useful and prosperous business, but his wife did not think it genteel enough. There were odors about the business, and sometimes they would adhere to his garments when he returned at night. She insisted on his doing something more elegant, although he was qualified for no business except that in which he was engaged. To please her he changed his business, and in order to get on faster abandoned church attendance, saying that after he had made a certain number of hundreds of thousands of dollars he would return to the church and its services. Where is that family to-day? Obliterated. Although succeeding in business for which he was qualified, he undertook a style of merchandise for which he had no qualification, and soon went into bankruptcy. His new style of business put him into evil association. He lost his morals as well as his money. He broke up not only his own home, but broke up another man's home, and from being a kind, pure, generous, moral man as any of you who sit here to-day, has become a homeless, penniless libertine. His wife's ambition for a more genteel business destroyed him and disgraced her, and blighted their only child.

But suppose now there be in our homes, as thank God there are in hundreds of homes here represented, on the wifely throne one who says not only by her words but more powerfully by her actions: "My husband, our destinies are united; let us see where industry, honesty, common sense, and faith in God will put us. I am with you in all your enterprises. I cannot be with you in person as you go to your daily business, but I will be with you in my prayers. Let us see what we can achieve by having God in our hearts, and God in our lives, and God in our homes. Be on the side of everything good. Go ahead and do your best, and though everything should turn out different from what we have calculated, you may always count on two who are going to help you, and God is one and I am the other." That man may have feeble health, and may meet with many obstacles and business trials, but he is coming gloriously through, for he is reinforced, and inspired, and spurred on by a woman's voice as much as was Barak by Deborah, when Sisera, with 900 iron chariots, came on to crush him and his army, and Deborah shouted in the ear of Barak: "Up! for this is the day in which the Lord hath delivered Sisera into thine hand." And the enemy fell back, and Sisera's chariot not getting along fast enough in the retreat, the General jumped out and took it afoot, and ran till he came to a place where a woman first gave him a drink of milk, and then sent a spike through his skull, nailing him to the floor.

In our effort to have the mother of every household appreciate her influence over her children we are apt to forget the wife's influence over the husband. In many households, the influence upon the husband is the only home influence. In a great multitude of the best and most important and most talented families of the earth there have been no descendants. There is not a child or a grandchild or any remote descendant of Washington or Charles Sumner or Shakespeare or Edmund Burke or Pitt or Lord Nelson or Cowper or Pope or Addison or Johnson or Lord Chatham or Grattan or Isaac Newton or Goldsmith or Swift or Locke or Gibbon or Walpole or Canning or Dryden or Moore or Chaucer or Lord Byron or Walter Scott or Oliver Cromwell or Garrick or Hogarth or Joshua Reynolds or Spencer or Lord Bacon or Macaulay. Multitudes of the finest families of the earth are extinct. As though they had done enough for the world by their genius or wit or patriotism or invention or consecration, God withdrew them. In multitudes of cases all woman's opportunity for usefulness is with her contemporaries. How important that it be an improved opportunity!

While the French warriors on their way to Rheims had about concluded to give up attacking the castle at Troyes because it was so heavily garrisoned, Joan of Arc, entered the room and told them they would be inside the castle in three days. "We would willingly wait six days, said one of the leaders. "Six!" she cried out, "you shall be in it to-morrow," and under her leadership on the morrow they entered. On a smaller scale every man has garrisons to subdue and obstacles to level, and every wife may be an inspired Joan of Arc to her husband.

What a noble, wifely ambition, the determination, God helping, to accompany her companion across the stormy sea of this life, and together gain the wharf of the celestial city! Coax him along with you! You cannot drive him there. You cannot nag him there. That is God's plan. He coaxes us all the way—coaxes us out of our sins, coaxes us to accept pardon, coaxes us to Heaven. If we reach that blessed place it will be through a prolonged and divine coaxing. By the same process take your companion, and then you will get there as well, and all your household. Do just the opposite to your neighbor. Her wifely ambition is all for this world, and a disappointed and vexed and unhappy creature she will be all the way. Her residence may be better than yours for the few years of earthly stay, but she will move out of it as to her body into a house about five and a half feet long and about three feet wide and two feet high, and concerning her soul's destiny you can make your own prognostication. Her husband, and her sons and daughters, who all, like her, live for this world, will have about the same destiny for the body and soul. You having had a sanctified and divine ennobled wifely ambition, will pass up into palaces, and what becomes of your body is of no importance, for it is only a scaffolding, pulled down now that your temple is done. You will stand in the everlasting rest and see your husband come in, and see your children come in, if they have not preceded you. Glorified Christian wife! Pick up any crown you choose from off the king's footstool and wear it; it was promised you long ago, and with it cover up all the scars of your earthly conflict.

Sixteen miles from Petersburg, Russia, was one of the royal palaces, and there one night Catherine, the Empress, entertained Prince Henry. It was severe winter and deep snow, and the Empress and the Prince rode in a magnificence of sleigh and robe and canopy never surpassed, followed by 2,000 sleighs laden with the first people of Russia, the whole length of the distance illumined by lamps and dazzling temples built for that one night, and imitations of mosques and Egyptian pyramids; and people of all nations, in all styles of costume, standing on platforms along the way, and watching the blaze of the pyrotechnics. At the palace the luxuries of kingdoms were gathered and spread, and at the table the guests had but to touch the center of a plate, and by magical machinery it dropped, and another plate came up loaded with still richer viands. But all that scene of the long ago shall be eclipsed by the greater splendors that will be gathered at the banquet made by the Heavenly King for those consecrated women who come in out of the wintry and snowy chill of their earthly existence into the warm and illumined palaces of Heaven. With the King himself and all the potentates, yourself robbed and crowned, you will sit at a table compared with which all the feasts at Kenilworth and St. Cloud and the Alhambra were a beggar's crust. And the platter of one royal satisfaction touched at the center shall disappear only to make room for a beggar's crust, and the golden plate of one royal satisfaction, touched at the center, shall disappear only to make room for the coming up of some richer and grander regalement.

A Great Thinker on "Convictions."

Benjamin Franklin, somewhat known to fame in this country and the whole civilized world as a patriot, philosopher, and statesman, delivered a characteristic speech to the convention which framed the United States Constitution, before appending his signature to that document. The following is an extract from his speech:

"Mr. President, I confess that I do not entirely approve of the Constitution at present; but I am not sure I shall never approve of it—for having lived long I have experienced many instances of being obliged by better information or fuller consideration, to exchange opinions, even on important subjects, which I once thought was right but found to be otherwise. It is, therefore, that the older I grow the more apt I am to doubt my own judgment, and to pay more respect to the judgment of others. Most men, indeed, as well as most sects in religion, think themselves in possession of all truth, and that when others differ from them it is so far error. Steele, a Protestant, in a dedication tells the Pope that the only difference between our two churches in their opinion of the certainty of the doctrine, is Romanish church is infallible and the Church of England is never in the wrong. But though many private persons think almost as highly of their own infallibility as that of their own sect, few express it so naturally as a certain French lady, who in a little dispute with her sister, said: 'I don't know how it happens, sister, but I meet with nobody but myself who is always in the right.'"

People who pride themselves on fixedness in one opinion, whether in politics or religion, on having "convictions" that cannot be shaken, may draw from the above a lesson to lodge in their memories. Let them try to imitate the broadness and strive after a little portion of the wisdom that the great Franklin displayed on so many momentous occasions. One actually feels more contented when he realizes that he is not altogether a superior being, too immaculate for this world of error and contention. No religious sect has all truth, no party all the patriotism, and no individual can claim unerring accuracy of perception and judgment.—Chapman Courier.

INTRODUCTORY.

A lesson for young men. The Bible is a young man's book; it is a photograph album, as it were, filled with the alert faces of youth. The first chapters of Genesis tell of a young man, the last chapters of Malachi are speaking of young men and children. The opening chapters of the New Testament are telling of a young Nazarene and his youthful companions. As a finis to the gospel there is the picture of a young man in heaven's bright apparel, sitting at a tomb's mouth, and the last chapter of Revelation is chanting in youthful freshness and vigor, "I am the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning star." No wonder Christ loved this young man in to-day's lesson; it was a part of the genius of the gospel that he should do so. Let the young, as they peruse these verses, feel that same unchangeable love constraining them still.

WHAT THE LESSON SAYS.

16. And behold. It was on the other side of Jordan, probably not far from the fords at Jericho. The distance between Galilee and Judea has been very rapidly passed over by Matthew. Jerusalem, with its Feast of Tabernacles, and Bethany, where Lazarus was to be raised, had both been visited, however, John and Luke supplying the missing links in the narrative.—One came. A young man, Luke says a ruler, probably among the Jews. Special emphasis is laid in the original upon the word one. He came by himself.—Good Master—rather (Cf. Tischendorf). Teacher—Eternal life—implying Jewish belief in the doctrine of immortality.

18. Which? What particular commandments?—Jesus said. Reciting, as a simple test, the last part of the decalogue.

19. Honor thy father and thy mother. The fifth commandment. Jesus recites them in the following order: sixth, ninth, fifth, adding the spirit of the tenth.

21. Perfect. Complete, with nothing behind or lacking.—That thou hast. One word, belongings.—The poor. Literally, those who crouch, referring to the mendicant habits of the unfortunate of that day.—And come. An adverb of place in the Greek, hither.

26. Beheld. More correctly, looked them in the face, signifying the deliberateness as well as the seriousness of the utterance.—Impossible. A form of the word can used above (v. 25). As if he said: No, man cannot, but God can.

WHAT THE LESSON TEACHES.

Good Master. It rolls off the tongue very easily. Master, good Master, teacher. What do you mean by it? Men say the word thoughtlessly, unmeaningly, addressing the Christ in some complacent moment or some instant of rote-prayer. Right there the voice of the Master arrests the heedless utterance: Hold! Why callest thou Me good? What do you mean by "Master?" Do you really wish to confess that I am the Son of God, for only God is supremely good? That was Peter's saving acknowledgment, on which the church is built. Do you mean to say that I am the Master of your soul? That is Christian cross-bearing. You are, then, not far from the kingdom.

He saith unto him which? Ah, tell-tale word. You wish to enter into life, do you? Well, then—and here comes the test—do you keep the commandments? Quick comes the young man's answer, "Which?" Our Lord's query has led the youth to an unwilling acknowledgment, in large part, of his weakness. Which commandment? As if obeying God were a mere watching of forms, an outward observance of rules, carefully numbered over on the fingers, washing of pots, counting of senseless beads—which? Have you not heard God's call and seen the door open to the commandments? "Which?" answers the young man, confessing his real failure at heart to hear and heed.

All these have I kept. He has been watching Christ's lips, his eye kindling in self-congratulation as the familiar formulas are spoken, and scarcely have the words ceased when he has straightway exclaimed: "All these have I kept!" Yes, you have kept the commandments, "all these," as you say; but have you kept the commandment? The sum and substance of the law. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with heart, mind, soul, strength—how about that? It is our common fault. We keep the law, and we lose sight of the Lawgiver. We observe the rite and the ordinance and we fail to love the Lord and Master. We do not well.

What lack I yet? A great deal. Young man, I have lived a pretty moral life, you say. I have had respect for statutes. I have not killed any man. I have not gotten my name into the scandal columns of the papers. I have run off with no man's wife. I have picked no man's pocket. I have not perjured myself. I have not turned my father and mother out of doors. I have not broken my neighbor's windows—"all these I have kept. What lack I yet?" Much, indeed.

If thou wilt be perfect. Morality is not righteousness. Negative innocence will not pass for positive holiness. Christ is speaking here of perfectness and completeness, a life with nothing lacking. Where is it to be found? Nowhere, save in him. But that means thorough self-abandonment and self-sacrifice. It is heart, soul, body—everything given to Christ. "Go and sell that thou hast and give to the poor." Lack? You lack everything because you have kept everything. "O, friends," said one, "we get whate'er we give."

Sell what thou hast. Another test, but given in sincerest friendliness. What he had to render was as nothing to what Christ had to give. The very severity of the test often proves the greatness of the love. "Come, help me," wrote the Prince of Wales to his father in a crisis of the battle of Crecy. "No," answered the King, viewing the situation and wishing his son to gain a great victory and great renown. "Let the boy win his own spurs." It was paternal fondness that spoke.

And come, follow me. First go, then come. There is a preparation. The going, indeed, was a part of the coming. The word "come" is like that other direction in the word of Christ: "Come unto me, all ye that labor." It is "hither," just a beckoning of the finger. "Follow me." Yes, emptied of self, he is then ready to follow. Not before. There was a car standing on the side-track, and chalked upon its side the words: "Bad order; not to go West." It looked fair, but the watchful eye of the car-tender had discovered a fatal defect. It was not ready for the long journey. How many of the young men who read this paragraph are? Hear Christ's words: "Go," "give;" then "come," "follow."

Went away sorrowful. It is the same word used of the adulterous Herod. "The King was sorry, nevertheless." He cut off the head of John the Baptist. Very ineffective sorrow this, also. The young man was very sorry, nevertheless he kept on going away. Well might he sorrow. He was going away with a handful of earth's coin; he was leaving behind him infinite riches; he was turning his back on a birthright of treasure in the heavens.

For he had great possessions. Great possessions has every young man, great possessions for Jesus' sake, possessions of life, of youth, of strength, of enterprise, of opportunity, of advantage, of privilege. Great possessions, it may be, of property, possibly of influence, perhaps of intellect, certainly of hours wherein and of powers wherewith to serve God. "I write unto you, young men," said John, "because ye are strong." Young man, what are you doing with your possessions of riches or strength? God gave them to you to use in his service. Are you using them to his praise? Let them not be weights to carry you downward, but, by God's grace, wings to lift you upward.

For a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. There is but one way. It is the same path as the poor man must tread. "By grace ye are saved." The Jew supposed that riches were as oil to the wheels of progress and were an assurance of acceptance with God. Not so, said Christ. They constitute a hindrance. ("How hardly.") Indeed it is impossible by them to enter the kingdom; as well think of a camel going through a needle's eye. "I am the way. No man cometh unto the Father but by me." Were the disciples "amazed"? Pentecost had not yet visited them.

WAR ANNALS.

Old Soldiers of Both Armies Fighting Their Battles Over Again.

Anecdotes of the Battle-field, the Weary March, and the Cheerful Camp-fire.

A Georgia Volunteer.

FAR up the lonely mountain side
My wandering footsteps led;
The moss lay thick beneath my feet,
The pine sighed overhead;
The trace of a dismantled fort
Lay in the forest nave,
And in the shadow near my path
I saw a soldier's grave.

The bramble wrestled with the weed
Upon the lowly mound;
The simple headboard, rudely writ,
Had rotted to the ground.
I raised it with a reverent hand,
From dust its words to clear,
But time had blotted all but these:
"A Georgia Volunteer."

I heard the Shenandoah roll
Along the vale below,
I saw the Alleghenies rise
Toward the realms of snow;
The valley campaign rose to mind,
Its leader's name, and then
I knew the sleeper had been one
Of Stonewall Jackson's men.

He sleeps; what need to question now
If he were wrong or right?
He knows ere this whose cause is just
In God, the Father's sight.
He wields no warlike weapons now,
Returns no foeman's thrust;
Who but a coward would revile
An honored soldier's dust?

Roll, Shenandoah, proudly roll
Adown the rocky glen;
Above thee lies the grave of one
Of Stonewall Jackson's men.
Beneath the cedar and the pine
In solitude austere,
Unknown, unnamed, forgotten, lies
A Georgia volunteer.

A Mysterious Disappearance

BY JAMES K. MAGIE, 78TH ILL.

IT was in June, 1863, that our brigade moved forward from Murfreesboro and occupied Shelbyville, Tenn. I was at that time Brigade Postmaster, with a sort of roving commission to go and come as I pleased, only it was expected that I would keep the brigade supplied promptly with its mail from home, and be equally prompt in forwarding the army mail to the lines of railway in the rear for transportation to the North. This was sometimes attended with difficulty, and not infrequently with danger. Upon reaching Shelbyville, which had been evacuated only a day or two before by the rebels, I took possession of the regular postoffice of the place. Passing over some interesting history of two or three journeys to Murfreesboro for mail, I come to the time when we had fixed up an old locomotive, with one or two cars attached, and were running two trains a day between Shelbyville and Wartrace. The main line from Nashville to Chattanooga ran through Wartrace, and Shelbyville was just eight miles to one side, and a rickety sort of a branch road had been built, connecting Shelbyville with the main line at Wartrace. By this time quite a large army was camped about Shelbyville, also at Wartrace, at which point our mail was now received regularly, except when interrupted by accident or by the enemy. It was my duty to go over to Wartrace every day and sort out the Shelbyville mail. One day we were on our return trip, and the old locomotive was groaning and puffing its way up a steep grade when I discovered a man at the top of the grade, about a quarter of a mile distant, coming toward us on a run, swinging his hat and shouting at the top of his voice for us to stop, or we would run over his horse. At first we thought that there had been a sudden attack on Shelbyville by the rebels and this was a messenger sent out to warn us. But it appeared that a break had occurred in the telegraph between Wartrace and Shelbyville, and the operator, with a companion, had each mounted a horse, and were following the railroad to find the break, and the operator, it appeared, had been so unfortunate as to ride his horse into one of the cattle-guards, and there he lay, refusing to help himself. The two men had been working for an hour with rails and all sorts of pries and other expedients to get the horse out and on his feet, but without avail. Then they heard the puffing of the locomotive, and, thinking it would soon be upon them, to the great injury of the horse, if not warned in time, the operator had hastened out to give us warning. I was on the locomotive at the time, and the engineer merely slowed up; but the man was frantic, thinking that he was not going to stop, and that his horse would be killed surely. By this time I had taken in the whole situation, and looking forward saw the horse, which had just then got a glimpse of the locomotive, and pricking up his ears he jumped out of that hole as nimble as a rabbit, and in three seconds he had disappeared in the timber, with the other man in hot pursuit on the other horse. All this was unobserved by the man who was shouting to us to hold up. The scene became ludicrous to us upon the locomotive, and I immediately became the spokesman.

"What's the matter?" I inquired.

"My horse stumbled into a cattle-guard just a little piece ahead here, and you will have to stop and help us get him out before you can pass."

By this time the young man had climbed upon the locomotive, and we were but a few rods from the place of accident, where a dozen or more rails were sticking out from the hole where the horse had lain. We all professed an entire disbelief in his story, and accused him of being a rebel guerrilla, with evil designs upon us.

"I am no rebel," he replied. "I am the telegraph-operator at Shelbyville, and you will find my horse in the hole, just as I have told you, and my comrade and I have been trying for an hour to get him out."

"Well, here is the hole," said I, as the locomotive stopped, and the fireman and I jumped off and began to pull out the rails.

"Now, where is your horse and your comrade you were talking about?"

No one not a witness of this scene can imagine the look of fright and terror that came over the countenance of this telegraph operator when he came to look into the hole and found no horse there. He even examined the depressions and crevices, as though the horse might have shrunk to the dimensions of a mouse. Then he surveyed the surrounding scenery, and at length cast his eyes to the tops of the surrounding trees, and looked through the branches, and then far off toward the clouds, as though that horse and his comrade and his comrade's horse must be visible somewhere. But neither sight nor sound of horses or comrade was apparent, and yet less than five minutes before he had left them at that very spot, with his own horse so tight in the hole that he had thought it would be necessary to draw him out by the power of the locomotive.

For at least three minutes he was speechless. Then, heaving a sigh, he remarked: "If that don't get me! I have heard of witchcraft, and after this I shall believe in it."

We had some difficulty in restraining our laughter, but now we all broke out into boisterous hilarity, and the great mystery was explained to the operator, and to accommodate him we ran back about a mile, found the break, repaired the wire, and when we arrived in Shelbyville, the operator found his horse and comrade, but it is doubtful whether he ever fully recovered from the shock occasioned by his conversion to the doctrine of witchcraft.

Kept a Bear.

THE Union soldiers of the extreme Northern and Middle States were often amused and sometimes puzzled at the Southern dialect. One such case happened to myself, which I have often related but never before put in print. After the defeat of the Confederate army at Kenesaw Mountain and their retreat toward Atlanta, the regiment to which I belonged was assigned to post duty at Marietta, Ga., for a short time, until we could get our "cracker brigade" into proper working order to supply the advancing army, and as a partial relief from the monotony of camp life I engaged day board with a Mrs. Reeves, in the village of Marietta. Soon after being domiciled there I inquired where her husband was. She said he had gone with the Southern army; then she went on to relate that he had successfully resisted all appeals to join the army. Even Governor Brown had coaxed him in person, all in vain; so they took him along by force. Very naturally I concluded he was a person of great importance in that vicinity, and inquired what business or occupation Mr. Reeves was engaged in before his enforced absence.

"He kep' a bear."

"Your husband was in the show business?" I queried by way of a feeler to get at the facts.

She answered me with evident surprise at my ignorance, and a rising inflection of the voice:

"No, sah! He kep' a bear, sah."

"Yes, I understand; but really, madam, I can not understand why he kept a bear if he was not in the show business."

"He kep' a bear, sah; a bear where he sold liquor, sah."

"Oh, yes; I see; Your husband was in the saloon business, as we Yankees would say. Oh, yes; excuse me; I didn't exactly understand your statement."

Her pronunciation of the word bar had entirely misled me as to her meaning.

The Confederate Flag.

DURING our civil war the several seceded States used at first distinctive State flags. In March, 1861, the Confederate Congress adopted the so-called "stars and bars," composed of three horizontal bars of equal width, the middle one white, the others red, with a blue union containing nine white stars arranged in a circle. The resemblance of this to the "stars and stripes" led to confusion and mistakes in the field; and in September, 1861, a battle-flag was adopted—a red field charged with a blue saltire, with a narrow border of white, on which were displayed thirteen white stars. In 1863 the "stars and bars" was supplanted by a flag with a white field, having the battle-flag for a union. The flag of 1863 was found deficient in service, it being liable to be mistaken for a flag of truce; and on February 4, 1865, the outer half of the field beyond the union was covered with a vertical red bar. This was the last flag of the Confederacy.

The first secession flag was actually raised in 1860, before the passage of the ordinance of secession by the State of South Carolina. Capt. Edward Mills, of the bark "Joes," belonging to the Palmetto Line of New York packets, raised this flag at his masthead in New York harbor, and his vessel was mobbed; but they could not compel him to strike his colors. On his return a gold-headed palmetto cane was presented to him by some of the Palmetto Guard, and in return he transferred to them the custody of the flag. The secession of the State was quickly followed by aggressive military movements, and the flag accompanied the Palmetto Guard in their various encampments. At the siege of Sumter it marked their parade ground, and was used in the truce boat that met the United States barges. The Palmetto Guards occupied the fort immediately after the surrender of Anderson; and this flag was the first raised on its walls after the salute, and before P. J. Moses had arrived at the fort. The flag remained with the company until they were mustered for the war, and was then taken in charge by Mr. John S. Bird, who has since recommitted it to the care of the Palmetto Guard.

The First Gun of the War.

THE Augusta (Ga.) Gazette publishes the following in reference to the Whitworth gun presented by the late C. K. Prioleau to the State of South Carolina:

"A few days before the bombardment of Fort Sumter in 1861—only two days, if our memory be correct—a sailing vessel entered the harbor under full sail and majestically passed the fort under a spanking breeze. On reaching the city she was found to have on board a Whitworth rifled steel gun, carrying a projectile weighing twelve pounds. Samples of these shells to the number of a dozen or more were a part of the invoice. The latter were sent as models or 'patterns,' from which a limitless supply might have been cast, but the imminence of the attack on Sumter was such that there was no time for the work.

"Accordingly, the gun, on a low rosewood carriage, was by the readiest means conveyed to Cummings Point at night, and was erected to the right of the celebrated iron battery of three-inch columbiads, and to the left of the three ten-inch mortars, which were concealed by a redan breastwork. A deep-cut embrasure in this latter revealed the diminutive steel piece at daybreak on the historical morning, peering out upon the angle of the grim fort in the bay where Captain Doubleday was in command. From this gun the venerable Edmund Ruffin of Virginia fired the first shot at or near 7:30 a. m., which, after a shrieking and ferocious transit, struck Sumter on the southeasterly angle.

"This little Whitworth was a present from Mr. Prioleau to the State of South Carolina, and this primitive discharge on the eventful morning signalized 'the very first employment of rifled artillery in war in the history of the world.'

"It might be added that the limited ammunition was divided at long distances during the progress of the bombardment, and that every shot struck Fort Sumter. The gun was afterward placed on a boat named the Lady Davis, and did effective work in harbor defense and fleet annoyance."

Bringing in a Skulker.

THERE were seen some men in the army—good fellows, some of them—who were so naturally organized it seemed an impossibility for them to face the enemy's fire. Cowards. Yes; that is what we called them. But the poor fellows could no more help running from the thunder and smoke of battle than they could prevent the wind blowing. They must have suffered a thousand times as intensely as did the bravest man who ever carried a gun. There was one of those sensitives with us, and no amount of punishment had the least effect toward his reformation. The roar of cannon or the smell of powder smoke seemed to always produce a double-loaded back-action on his legs, and if we wished to find him we must make a thorough search far in the rear. A son of his was with us who was as brave a soldier as ever went into battle. For his sake, and for family feeling, we omit names.

At Walnut Hill, when we were carrying off our wounded from the battle-ground of Chickamauga, we had to march over a road circling around and far up above a precipice; and a dangerous road it was for teams to pass over; for on an incline, if the wagons got the least advantage over the mules, over they were bound to go to sure destruction. Therefore before we ventured over it, a detail of some six or eight from each company was made to put the road in safe condition. We had not yet finished our work, when we were attacked by a skirmishing party of the enemy. Soon we were formed in line of battle.

Lieutenant Dawson, of Company F, Ninety-sixth Illinois, who was in command of the detailed force, here stepped up to me and said:

"Bill, one of your men is gone." I looked; sure enough, our chronic skulker, who happened to be in my squad, was not there.

"After him and bring him back?" commanded the Lieutenant.

Back some distance there was quite a good hiding-place among some rocks, and there I was sure to find him. So off I started, and soon met a fellow-soldier, who, having heard the firing, was coming down to see what was the matter.

"Have you seen a man up this way," I asked, "who looked as though he was running away?"

"Yes, sir," he replied, "right back here among the rocks." Then he proceeded to describe his hiding-place in such a manner I could easily find him.

On I went. Soon I discovered him in his, as he supposed, safe retreat. I dropped my gun to trail arms, and ran along right past him, looking neither to the right nor left, but hurrying along as though the getting out of that was a matter of life and death. I had barely got past him when I heard him, in a cautious tone, call after me:

"Bill, what's the matter?"

I paid no attention. He threw his gun and ran after me, scared almost to death.

"Bill, what's up? Where are they?"

"They are right back there after us, and they are in such force they will have every blamed wretch of us if we don't get out of this. Go back and get your gun, and come on," I replied.

He snatched up his gun and was soon at my heels.

"Which way must we go, Bill?" he questioned, as he came up.

"Right down this little ravine, around that point," I answered, and soon he was ahead of me, putting in his best licks to get out of the way of danger. As he turned the point he came right into our lines.

"Jerusalem's King!"—these were not the exact words he used, but they are sufficiently expressive for present purposes. He felt badly cheated, I suppose, but I held him in position until the skirmish was over.

Out of the Hog's Reach.

WHILE we were stationed in the hills of Arkansas, Billy Potter, Joe Potter, and I were detailed on picket. The place selected for us to watch being in a level tract of tall timber-land, well grown with saplings, of very smooth bark, and generally twenty to thirty feet to the first branches. The first thing we knew we were in a large nest of wild hogs. Our next strike was to save ourselves, and each one of us tried our gymnastics on a tree. Potter made the best use of time, and, as he supposed, had reached a short bend in his tree, where he stopped to rest from such hard climbing:

"Boys," he said, "I've struck an easy place."

"You are not as high as I am," I replied.

I could tell by the sound of his voice that he was lower than I was.

He answered: "Don't go any higher; I can assure you you are out of the hog's reach."

After a while the moon rose, and Potter discovered himself sitting flat on the ground, where he had been hugging the tree all that time for dear life. We were not interrupted any more that night. J. F. STOWNE.

WEAK AND NERVOUS WOMEN.

How Strength of Nerves and Health of Body May Easily Be Obtained.

Women are great sufferers from nervousness, weakness, nervous prostration, and exhaustion. They droop and languish under burdens and cares and work which never ends. They retire tired and wake tired and unrefreshed, they are worn out and exhausted in nerve and vital power, and have no strength or energy.

Fortunately—and it would almost seem a dispensation of Divine Providence to overworked humanity—there are medicines which restore lost nerve forces, rebuild the weakened system and re-establish health, strength and energy. These medicines, which are purely vegetable, have been combined into a wonderful remedy known as Dr. Greene's Nervura Nerve Tonic, which is kept by all druggists at $1 per bottle. This truly wonderful remedy is without doubt the greatest discovery of the century, and is the best strengthening and invigorating remedy ever known.

For nervous and physical exhaustion, weak, tired and languid feelings, with no power or ambition for exertion, it is a sovereign remedy and absolutely certain cure. In cases of sleeplessness and nervous irritability its use will be followed by calm repose and natural, refreshing sleep. For nervousness, nervous debility, exhausted vitality, despondency and depression of the mind it is a perfect specific. For neuralgia, rheumatism, paralysis, numbness, trembling and insanity it is the only positive and recognized remedy. It never fails to cure nervous and sick headache, weakness and pain in the back and side, palpitation of the heart, apoplexy, epileptic fits, hysteria, St. Vitus' dance, dyspepsia, indigestion, loss of appetite, constipation, biliousness, kidney and liver diseases.

Other medicines may be offered by druggists, but do not be persuaded to try uncertainties, when by the use of this wonderful remedy you can certainly be cured. Should your druggist not have Dr. Greene's Nervura Nerve Tonic, he will get it for you if you insist upon having it. Dr. Greene, its discoverer, is the great specialist in the cure of nervous and chronic diseases, and he may be consulted by those using this remedy, or by any sufferer from disease, free of charge, at his office, 35 West 14th st., New York personally or by letter.

Sam Jones in Boston.

I want to spend a few moments on the foundation of character. We have as a general rule in this gospel-taught land a very poor idea of manhood. Our best men will get up in experience meetings and call themselves "poor worms of the dust." You are no worm of the dust. Suppose the next time you go away from home your wife should address you a letter in these words, "My dear worm of the dust," and suppose on some of your trips you should incidentally start your letter to your wife, "My dear worm."

I believe in involution a great deal stronger than I do evolution. We are on the upward tendency. I have often wondered if we come by evolution, would nature evolute again, and if she did would it be a boy or a girl? I have had some curiosity on that line myself. I think surely that God made you and me, and I am out of patience with that religious cant going about the country singing, "Oh! to be nothing." Suppose as Brother Nothing you should go to heaven. They will be everlastingly running over you, for you can't see anything up there.

How can you crown nothing and how can nothing play a harp? I don't know where we get so many of these foolish ideas. A great deal of it has grown out of our orthodox idea of total depravity. I believe that every man, woman and child in this country have enough natural innate meanness to damn them, and if any fellow wants more than that he is very greedy. A man says when I could do good, evil is ever present. It is so much easier to do wrong than to do right. It is easier to stay sober than it is to stay drunk. I know because I have tried it. It is much easier to tell the truth than to tell a lie. It is easier to do right than it is to do wrong, and I have no patience with any other theory.

A piano gets out of harmony. The man that made that piano can put it in tune. A man can no more put himself in harmony than that piano. The God that made you can put you in harmony with yourself, and set every chord in your nature in perfect tune with the ten commandments, and make every chord vibrate with music that would charm an angel's ear. If I was seeking the basis of character I believe I would place it on the affections. A man's power to love determines his immortality. With the affection in complete subjection you have a man who loves everything that is right and hates everything that is wrong.—Boston Globe.

The Whole Story.

Ben Jonson lived in the time when poets were not only expected to write all sorts of rhyme for pay, but were generally very glad to get such jobs as composing epitaphs for rich men's tombstones, and versified compliments for popular coffee-houses.

No doubt, if Longfellow had lived in that day, he would not have had occasion to be angry with the man who should have called upon him, as a certain salve-peddler once did, with a request to write a poem in praise of his salve, which he would have printed on slips and circulated in advance to advertise his wares.

But even Ben Jonson was sometimes put to his wits' end to get up rhymes in praise of his rich patrons. He was once requested by a young man to write the epitaph of a man who had died and left him, the young man, a large estate. The poet wanted to know what the dead man had done—what he was remarkable for.

"Well," said the young man, "I can't say that he ever did anything."

"Did he ever give away money in charity?"

"N-no," said the young man; "not that I ever heard of."

"Was he reputed to have done any kind acts?"

"No."

"Just lived, and kept his money, and died in the same place, eh?"

"That was about all."

"How old was he when he died?"

"Forty-six," said the young man.

"Well, that's something. I suppose there must be an epitaph. Let me see."

Jonson paused and wrote a moment.

"How will this serve?" he asked.

The young man took the bit of paper, on which Jonson had written:

"Here lies a man was born and cried,
Told six and forty years, and died!"

How to Reduce Your Expenses.

You can do it easily, and you will not have to deprive yourself of a single comfort; on the contrary, you will enjoy life more than ever. How can you accomplish this result? Easily; cut down your doctor's bills. When you lose your appetite, and become bilious and constipated, and therefore low-spirited, don't rush off to the family physician for a prescription, or, on the other hand, wait until you are sick abed before doing anything at all; but just go to the druggist's and for twenty-five cents get a supply of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets. Take them as directed, and our word for it, your unpleasant symptoms will disappear as if by magic, you will have no big doctor's bill to pay, and everybody interested (except the doctor) will feel happy.

To-day you look ever so much younger, and it is very evident from your beaming face that your low spirits have taken flight." "Yes, indeed," was the reply; "and shall I tell you what drove them away? Poisoned by Scrofula

The taint of scrofula in the blood should be got rid of or serious consequences may result. Consumption is undoubtedly scrofula of the lungs, and in its early stages may be cured by purifying the blood and building up the system. For this Hood's Sarsaparilla is unequaled. It also cures scrofula when it appears in the form of running sores, boils, bunches in the neck, catarrh, or in any other manner. While it purifies, Hood's Sarsaparilla also enriches the blood.

"I have been troubled with scrofula for three years having running sores on my leg. After taking one bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla I am getting well rapidly." ASA ELBEL, South Bend, Ind.

ST. JACOBS OIL. TRADE MARK. SCIATICA.

Misery.—It is instructive to note from the catalogue of diseases that nine-tenths of fatal cases reach their chronic stage through a stupid indifference to a correct treatment when the system is first assailed. It is easily shown that thousands of lives could be saved.

NERVOUS PAINS.

Torture.—For instance SCIATICA, which so sorely afflicts the human family, and which is defined to be neuralgia of the sciatic nerve, rheumatism of the hip-joint, or parts adjoining it, hip gout, pains in the loins and hips, even in its mildest form never seizes its prey without due warning.

SYMPTOMS.

Acute.—Sudden and acute pains in the hip and loins; redness, swelling, tenderness, soreness, fever, lameness and sometimes excruciating pains. The disease rapidly develops into chronic or inflammatory stage.

TREATMENT.

Cure.—Rub the parts affected thoroughly and vigorously with St. Jacobs Oil; create a burning sensation by the friction of rubbing on the Oil; apply warmth; flannels wrung out in hot water.

The treatment of many thousands of cases of those chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in nicely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result, of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar ailments.

As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the womb and its appendages in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic.

As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system. For morning sickness, or nausea, from whatever cause arising, weak stomach, indigestion, dyspepsia and kindred symptoms, its use, in small doses, will prove very beneficial.

"Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhea, excessive flowing, painful menstruation, unnatural suppressions, prolapsus, or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation and ulceration of the womb, inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

As a regulator and promoter of functional action, at that critical period of change from girlhood to womanhood, "Favorite Prescription" is a perfectly safe remedial agent, and can produce only good results. It is equally efficacious and valuable in its effects when taken for those disorders and derangements incident to that later and most critical period, known as "The Change of Life."

"Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

"Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years. Large bottles (100 doses) $1.00, or six bottles for $5.00.

WILLARD A. [illegible]

CHARLEVOIX, FEB. 2[illegible], 188[illegible]

The Marquette Mining Journal (Dem.) says there is a great deal of force in the Delta's remark that "so long as the Soo canal remains uncompleted, the Hay lake channel unimproved, Marquette's harbor but half large enough for her immense shipping, and the Portage Lake canal in the hands of a private corporation; so long as Grand Marais harbor remains useless for the lack of additional appropriation, leaving the dangerous waste of Lake Superior from Grand Island to Whitefish point without refuge for storm driven vessels; so long as not a lighthouse glimmers anywhere on the north shore of Lake Michigan from Mackinac to Poverty Island, the residents of the upper peninsula cannot be expected to view the much-bemoaned surplus of the holy horror it seems to provoke in the free trader, when using it as an argument in favor of a reduction of the tariff.

Gen. Nathan Goff, of West Virginia, has the knack of putting things so plainly that the wayfaring man, even, may not err in understanding them. Of this nature is his recent remark on the tariff, to the effect that an economic system that has been championed by Washington, Hamilton, Madison, Lincoln, Sumner and Garfield, and which is now championed by Sherman, Kelly and Blaine, is right, even though it was or is opposed by Calhoun, Toombs, Yancey, Breckenbridge, Jefferson Davis, Carlisle and Cleveland. The line of demarkation between a broad, patriotic, national view and a narrow, demagogic, self-seeking policy, could not well be made plainer.

In order to make Delaware a democratic state, beyond all question, 300 republican citizens of Wilmington have been disfranchised. Democratic assessors and democratic policemen managed to exclude them from enrollment by sharp practice, and even actual force. The democratic party seems to have practically adopted the policy of keeping in power by fraud rather than by the vote of the people. Whenever it gets itself intrenched in office, it tries to perpetuate its lease of power by scoundrelism. The game was tried in Ohio in 1885, but it wouldn't work. The same may also be said of Indiana.—Toledo Blade.

The utter absurdity of the democratic comments on Mr. Blaine's letter is enough to produce on grand burst of Homeric mirth, wide as the country from ocean. Before it was published, they were cock-sure that Blaine would be the republican candidate, and that of all possible ones he would be the one most easily beaten. Now they declare with the same positiveness that he was the only man they feared, and that Cleveland's success is certain.

The "white folks" of Atlanta, Ga., have another trouble. They have discovered that they have in their midst a music teacher who gives lessons to colored as well as white pupils. This is horrible! The poor music teacher's life has been made wretched in consequence, and even a so-called Christian church for which he acts as organist threatens to dismiss him if he continues to teach dark-skinned girls to play the piano.

San Francisco is said to be overrun by thieves of every description. The gang is well organized, and jokingly bade defiance to the whole police force by entering the house of the chief while the family were all at home and getting away with $1,500 worth of jewelry. They are said to be protected by an official who has become a millionaire on a salary of less than $300 a month.

A bar of iron that is worth but $5 in its natural state is worth $12 when it is made into horse-shoes. After it goes through the different processes by which it is made into needles, its value is increased to $358. Made into penknife blades, it would be worth $3,000; and put into balance wheels for watches, $250,000.

It is now asserted that Russia is endeavoring to secure England's neutrality in case of war with the combined alliance. Russia argues that Germany, if triumphant, would absorb Holland and threaten England.

There is no doubt that Abraham Lincoln's birthday is hereafter to be the principal anniversary celebrated by members of the republican party.

An apparatus is being perfected by which telephoning can be carried on between ship at sea, the water being used as a sound conveyor.

Emma Abbott is worth $300,000 and she says that now at last her operatic aspirations are satisfied.

The cedar shingle boom throughout Northern Michigan was never so big as this winter.

Cameran Bros., of Torch Lake, are doing a large business this winter in their line of trade.

Jim Funk, formerly a Petoskey saloon keeper, and late wife murderer, was found guilty and sentenced to state's prison for life.

Mr. Dennis, an old and respected citizen of Eveline, died recently at the home of his daughter in Grand Rapids of heart disease.

Dan Blakeley, of Eastport, has put in an immense stock of goods which he purchased in Detroit and elsewhere. It will give the mercantile business of Eastport a boom.

The storage battery of the electric light company arrived at Petoskey last week. It has 250 cells and will store sufficient electricity to run 500 sixteen candle lights for five hours.

The firm hitherto known as McOmber & Smith, of Petoskey, has been dissolved by mutual consent Mr. Smith and Mr. Pepper retiring therefrom, and Mr. McOmber continuing the business.

Capt. Joseph Sullier, who sailed the schooner Napoleon, the first vessel ever taken over the Sault portage, died a day or two since at Mackinac, where he had resided fifty years. He was 90 years old.

Early Sunday morning fire was discovered in the St. Ignace lock-up. A prisoner had set fire to a mattress, and when the door was opened the four inmates escaped and have not yet been recaptured.

And now the saloon men in Lenawee county think they can "bust" the election in several townships in that county, because they opened and closed the polls on sun time, instead of legal standard time.

The meanest man in Michigan, who was arrested at St. Ignace the other day for stealing a half dollar from a dead mans eyes, was photographed and a considerable batch of the pictures were sold for the benefit of the dead mans widow.

Papers are being circulated for signers by some of the Democrats in Cheboygan, petitioning for the positions that are to be made vacant by the removal of the Republican lighthouse keepers in the Straits and elsewhere. The rush promises to be greater than the demand, and some lively kicking will no doubt be done.

The locomotive E. C. Cummer, of the C. & N. E. railroad, named in honor of her late victim, has been retired to the round house, never more to be steamed up, but to be kept as a memorial of the evil she has done. Her name has been erased, and her whistle has not been sounded since that sad affair.

Boyne Citizen: Chas. Schaub started on Monday to take his father's remains to his old home in Wisconsin. Mr. Schaub Sr. met his death with the ill-fated Champlain. ——Dr. J. T. Brown, of Eagle, Mich., died on the 22d, of consumption. Dr. Brown formerly practiced here, and has many warm friends who will mourn his death. He has been sick a long time.

Robert Pautz, the Frankfort blacksmith who had a little windfall of $15,000 recently, was greatly astonished thereat and exclaimed: "Gott in Himmel, is dot so?" He had jokingly said that if he drew the prize he would help a farmer friend of his pull all the stumps on the farm, and now he is going at the job. He is an honest man, and industrious, withal, but of late has been in poor health.

We are pleased to learn that Mr. Orrie Moffat is to become a permanent resident of Traverse City. The firm of Moffat & Roberts will continue—Orrie taking the place of his late father. The new firm has purchased the abstract books of Steele & Titus and will take possession of the same April 21st, and will then do a law and abstract business. The firm of Steele & Titus will continue the insurance and real estate business.

Petoskey Record: The first assessment of 52 per cent was levied on the gas well stock on Saturday, payable at the Bank on or before to-day. ——Mr. Birkett has been running the pulp mill night and day this winter and has used over fifty carloads of spruce bolts since December.——On Thursday last Mr. S. Rosenthal received the sad news of the death of his aged father, who was a resident of Bialystok, Poland. His store was closed in consequence from Thursday until Monday.

The East Jordan Enterprise says that the Palmiter Bros. new mill started up Tuesday for the season.——That advices from California [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] it is feared that he will become a permanent cripple.——That Douglas C. Loveday has sold the lot just south of the Commercial House to Harry Branch, who will erect a fine brick building thereon during the coming season.

At Cadillac a few nights ago as Al. Briggs, the night watchman at the Cummer Lumber Company's mill, entered the fire room at 2 a. m., he was struck with holy horror at the sight of the ghost of Oliver Blair sitting on the front of the arch, holding his hands as if trying to warm them. The fire-room door was opened as though the spectre had entered from the shed, where he was drowned a few days ago. Mr Briggs was the man who found Mr. Blair's body and helped remove him, and was perfectly familiar with his face, and says he will swear it was the form of the man we all know to be dead. The blood curdling sight struck such terror to the soul of the poor nightwatch that he would not watch another night for a thousand dollars. [A clear case of the effects of Cadillac whisky.]

This is what Charley Hampton says: The banner county of the 11th district is Manitou, which gave 136 votes for Breen and only 2 for Seymour. All honor to the Democrats of Beaver Island for their splendid vote. Many of them had to walk ten or fifteen miles through large drifts, with the thermometer 15 degrees below zero. ——The most remarkable vote which has been cast in Michigan for years was that of old "Pony," the Indian chief, who, although he is more than a hundred years old walked four miles across the ice from Garden Island to St James to cast for Bartley Breen what the feeble old man believes to be his last vote. [Had he voted for Seymour Hampton would have characterized him as a worthless and unprincipled old heathen.]——R. McNeill, of Charlevoix county, left Sunday night for New York City to visit brother who is dangerously ill.

E. H. Hall, of Detroit, in a communication to the Farwell Register, regarding the bonds voted in aid of the Toledo, Ann Arbor & Cadillac R. R., says: "It is very unfortunate that citizens to whom money is due should suffer for the lack of it. But I believe it is a mistake, and a great injustice to imagine that the delay in payment is wanton or wilful. The panic in the eastern money market last summer might well have stopped all railroad building, but to continue on at all hazards and finish the road to Cadillac, was in the interest of the entire public, even at the risk of incurring debts beyond the immediate ability of the company to pay. Mr. Ashley faced the crisis, and I think acted wisely; and while I am sorry for the embarrassment of those whose debts are for a time postponed, I cannot withhold from Mr. Ashley the credit he has well earned by the accomplishment of a great object.

The Milwaukee Sentinel has a dispatch from Escanaba Mich., stating that the scheme of uniting Lakes Superior and Michigan to save several hundred miles of navigation, as suggested six or seven years ago, has revived under the inspiration of the northern Michigan boom. The plan is to construct a canal connecting the two great bodies of water from the head of Big Bay de Noque, in Lake Michigan, to South Bay, in Lake Superior, a distance of fourty miles. It is now learned authentically that New York and Minneapolis capitalists have revived the subject and that a surveying party will soon commence locating a route, with the view of the construction of this important waterway. Competent engineers whose attention was directed to the subject pronounced it perfectly feasible. Chicago, Milwaukee, Duluth and Marquette would be particularly benefited by the proposed canal, the distance being reduced fully one day, besides the dangerous passages through the straits of Mackinaw and the "Soo." Out of the entire output Escanaba now ships fully one-half the ore from the peninsula mines. Vessel freights from Escanaba to Chicago last season averaged $2 25 per ton, while from Marquette they were from $1.75 to $2. By the proposed canal route a great distance would be saved, and accordingly the rates would be reduced considerably. More ore would be shipped to Chicago, and that point would become a greater distributer than at present, vessels making three trips where two are made from Marquette to that port. The estimated cost of the canal is $5,000,000, and it is said that if sufficient capital can be interested, and the plan meets the expectations of those now interested, the work will be undertaken, making a canal and charging reasonable toll. Vessel captains speak highly of the project and say that it would prove a grand achievement, both to owners and shippers.

When [illegible], there rests an [illegible]
As we rock the cradle [illegible]

We lay aside the cradle, the bird its nest has flown,
And spread its pinions boldly, to make its way alone,
To fly, to fall to sorrow or rise and keep its way
Mid toils, temptations, triumphs, fails fruitage [illegible]
As we lay aside the cradle.

We bend above the coffin, another soul has fled,—
The earthly fight is over, is won or lost, and dead
The babe who in the cradle first knew of earthly strife,

As we bend above the coffin

NEATLY TRAPPED.

Jim and I were prospecting for gold around Mount Cole, a great rocky elevation that lies between Fiery Creek and Magoari, in Southern Australia. No precious metal had then been found in the district, though the hillsides from a distance looked as if they were covered with snow, owing to the large quantity of broken quartz that lay scattered about on the surface of the ground in every direction.

My friend had a notion that gold was the metallic base of quartz, and that where there was so much of the latter substance about, there must of necessity be some of the former too, if one could but be fortunate enough to find it.

His theory was quite erroneous, of course, as I afterwards learned, for silicon, not gold, is the base of quartz, but at the time when we met with the adventure I am about to relate, I had no doubt in my mind that Jim was right, and gladly followed him to Mount Cole. There we encamped by the side of a limpid flowing stream, under the lee of a huge boulder of granite, but all around was to be seen an immense quantity of broken white quartz, a sure indication, as Jim then believed, that gold was to be found at no great distance.

A month or six weeks' trial of the place convinced us, however, that if any of the precious metal existed there we were not destined to be its discoverers. We sunk shaft after shaft in flat, and gully, and on hillside in vain; not even the "color" did we find, and gave up the search in disgust.

Before removing to fresh quarters we thought we would enjoy a day's shooting or two, for the woods abounded with parakeets and cockatoos of every kind, from huge white fellows with lemon crests down to the tiny green and blue lorikeets that clung in such swarms to the flowering branches of the gum trees.

There were kangaroos in the ravines and on the slopes of the mountain, as well as opossums and flying squirrels of all sorts and sizes in the trees, and bandicoots in the grass grown gullies. The [illegible] swarmed with birds of every description, and there were eels and crayfish in the rivulets and brooks, and especially in the larger stream by the side of which we had pitched our tent, while vast herds of wild cattle roamed on the adjacent hills, where they encamped in companies, or [illegible] families, consisting of a dozen or two of cows with their calves of various ages, and one old bull, [illegible] the [illegible] and fairly drove [illegible] every other [illegible] in the forest.

On the Sunday before we were to remove for good from the vicinity of Mount Cole we went out for a stroll in the afternoon. We never did any work or carried our guns on that day, if we observed it in no other manner. Roaming [illegible] farther than we intended, we were overtaken by the darkness that almost immediately follows the setting of the sun in Australia.

We were not alarmed, for we knew the lay of the country, and could, moreover, catch a glimpse of a star here and there through the branches of the trees. This enabled us to proceed in the right direction for our camp, of which we had taken the bearings from the first.

As we groped our way along, we suddenly perceived something white just before us in a clump of bushes that grew in the center of one of the gullies we had to cross before we could arrive at the site of our encampment.

"A quartz boulder," I suggested.

"No, I saw it move—it's an animal of some kind," said Jim; "may be an albino kangaroo."

"It's a calf a few hours old!" I remarked, as I put down my hand to touch the little animal, which immediately staggered to its feet, and began to low in a piteous tone for its mother.

Before either of us could realize the danger we ran, that exemplary bovine parent was down upon us with a rush that would inevitably have put a final stop to our career, had we not instinctively dodged her behind a tree, round which she followed us many times, with a perseverance worthy of a better cause.

"What's to be done, Jim?" I asked, as for the fiftieth time at least we waltzed, so to speak, round that tree, to the music of the old cow's angry bellowing, and the young calf's piteous cries for help, which last were quite superfluous, for no one had meant to harm it, and its fears therefore were utterly groundless.

If that old cow could only have believed it, we were but too anxious to get away from her and her precious offspring; but she thought we had felonious intentions in its regard, and declined to let us go without first bringing us into contact with her horns, which were particularly long and pointed, as we had ample opportunity to remark. Yes, we were only too anxious to get away; but she was not a reasonable cow, and kept following us round and round that tree until we were almost ready to drop with giddiness and fatigue.

"What's to be done, Jim? This can't go on for ever."

"No," said my mate. "I've been thinking, suppose you make a run for another tree, and I'll dodge her for a bit while you get away, and then I'll make a bolt; I think I can run as fast as she can, and I shall have the start."

This was good advice, but I would not go first, and while we were dodging round, and each wishing the other to escape, there was a sound of many feet approaching, and a dark mass seemed to detach itself from the hillside, and move toward us at a rapid rate. We might dodge one cow all night, but the whole herd, whose camping ground we had unwittingly invaded, was charging down upon us! We should be trampled to death in an instant.

The old cow heard her friends approaching as well as we did, and turning her head in their direction, [illegible] to them to make haste.

"Climb for your life," said my mate. [illegible] of the tree, by which we stood, which Jim did the same. In less time than it has taken me to write this sentence, we were some ten feet up the tree, which happened to be an ironbark, and the projections on its sides afforded us foot and hand hold, so that we clambered up with comparative ease.

Having so far distanced our enemies we proceeded more leisurely, but had not reached the first branch before some of the infuriated animals below butted so violently against our refuge that, had it been of slimmer growth than it was, we must have been shaken down. Happily it was as immovable as a rock, and in spite of the danger of our situation, we actually laughed at the impotent fury of the cattle.

We climbed up carefully until we reached the lowest branches, where we settled ourselves [illegible] securely in a fork, with our backs against the trunk and pelted the cows with bits of the rugged bark, an indignity they resented by staring at us, and lashing their flanks, as they lowed their regret that we had escaped their vengeance.

Nevertheless, our predicament was an awkward one, although it had its comic side, and we laughed at this, but not for very long, for the night was cold, bitterly cold, and we but lightly clad, we were hungry, too, and thirsty, which was rather worse.

The leaves of the ironbark afforded neither meat nor drink, and we began ere long to entertain serious anticipations as to the ultimate result of our adventure.

Would the animals go away when it was morning? And if they did, would that wretched cow and her abominable white calf go with them?

What if we were to fall asleep during the night, and tumble from our perch upon the uplifted horns of the watchful herd below? We should be transfixed upon horns as formidable as any pointed stakes, be tossed up and down by our infuriated jailers, and finally trampled into pulp beneath their cloven hoofs.

The prospect was by no means a pleasant one, and to prevent as far as possible its realization we strapped ourselves with our belt to the branches upon which we sat.

The night was cold, bitterly cold, as I have said, and towards morning there was frost. Our guards had lain down all round the tree, so that we had not even a chance of creeping down silently, and stealing quietly away while they slept. We were almost famished, yet I believe we dozed for a few minutes occasionally, for I recollect starting now and then, thinking I was falling, but happily we were able to maintain our position in the tree.

Our clothes were saturated with dew, and I partially quenched my thirst by sucking what had collected on the few leaves within my reach; but the cold! Our forced inactivity made us feel it more keenly than we should have done had we been able to move about, and so keep our blood in a state of more active circulation.

At last the morning broke, and the dawn quickly broadened into day; then the cows began to move.

The mother of the calf was evidently uneasy at the thought of being left with her offspring, while we yet remained alive, if in the tree, for she bellowed again and again, and rubbed noses with some of her friends. Her entreaties were disregarded, however, for after a few minutes consultation the entire herd trotted off, leaving the old cow at the foot of the tree, where she still kept careful watch of her prisoners.

There was plenty of grass in the gully, and an abundance of succulent herbage, so that she was able to satisfy her appetite without moving far from our sheltering tree.

What were we to do? Our only hope was that someone might pass by within hearing, and we shouted "cooee" every now and then as loudly as we could, without any result.

At last, when we were almost exhausted with cold and hunger, thirst, and want of sleep, as well as cruelly cramped by the constrained position we had been compelled to maintain for so many hours, we heard a joyful sound, the most musical and delightful we had listened to for many hours, namely, the short, impatient yelping of a dog in pursuit of game.

We shouted till we were hoarse, cooeeing and calling "Rover," "Dash," and "Tinker," and every other canine appellation we could think of, but no answering shout responded, though the dog was evidently fast approaching.

Our jailer heard the dog as soon as we did, and showed manifest signs of alarm, for she immediately went to the clump of bushes where her calf was lying, and pushed her offspring with her nose to make it get up, but it would not stir.

Presently a kangaroo came in sight, and was followed closely by a dog, half collie, half greyhound. There was a water hole at the foot of the gully, into which the hunted marsupial leaped at once, unnoticed by the cow, which rushed furiously at the pursuing dog, and a sharp conflict ensued.

We did not wait to see the result, for we took the opportunity, and, descending from our elevated perch, ran off at top speed, and reached our camp in safety.—W. T. Greene, in Golden Argosy.

It is Well to Remember.

That happiness is not perfection unless it is shared.

That great possessions may bring great misfortunes.

That a foolish friend does more harm than a wise enemy.

That the hardest thing to empty out of the heart is conceit.

That it is not necessary to be mean because one is a man of means.

That good temper, like a sunny day, sheds a brightness over everything.

That one of the causes that leads us to misfortune is that we live according to the example of others.—Good Housekeeping.

Custer at Gettysburg.

Colonel Grant relates that General Custer once met in this city a noted cavalry officer who was a good writer and talker, and who was delivering a lecture on Gettysburg after the war. Handing Custer a couple of tickets for the lecture, the cavalryman remarked: "I hope you will come, for I describe all the cavalry movements in that fight. By the way, I transfer your brigade from the right wing, where it did operate, to the left wing and mass it with my brigade; it makes the story more imposing, you know."

Witchcraft in Southern Indiana.

About sixty years ago many of the people residing in the neighborhood of East Enterprise were possessed with the idea that witches were [illegible] and that a number of the [illegible] were full fledged witches, possessing remarkable powers, even to saddling and bridling a man and with sharp spurs ride him all night over the worst roads a distorted mind could imagine. In the morning the poor man would be so tired and sore he could hardly move. At other times the housewife would churn half a day and would not get a particle of butter. The only remedy was to take an old horseshoe that had been worn on the left hind foot of a bald faced horse and heat it red hot and drop it into the churn, which was pretty certain to expel the terrible witch. One who tried the experiment said: "When I dropped the redhot shoe into the churn I heard something run off the roof of the house, and I smelt hair just as sure as you are born, and in five minutes I had a churn nearly full of butter. The next day I saw the woman that I believed had bewitched the butter, and her hair was crisp on one side in the very shape of a horseshoe." If the above remedy failed, the next thing to do was to draw a lifesize picture of the supposed witch and nail it upon a tree and then run a silver bullet out of a silver dollar and shoot the image. This last act was considered a complete cure. One of the ardent believers in witches, a man in the prime of life, possessed fair sense in other matters, told in our hearing what a trying ordeal he had passed through a few evenings before. He had been to visit the sick, and was returning about 10 o'clock through the fields, often climbing fences. Finally as he got up on a high ten-rail fence with one leg thrown over the top rail he saw standing on the other side one whom he knew to be a "witch." She said nothing, but put a spell on him that riveted him to the spot and he was as speechless as Lot's wife when she was turned into salt. When daylight came the witch vanished, and he got over the fence and went home. He says the top rail was a sharp one, and he didn't get over the soreness for a month.

When the hens failed to hatch their eggs it was all laid to the witches. The witches always did their worst work on Friday. If the rail fences fell down when they were covered with sleet and ice, the witches were blamed with it. If a calf got choked on apples or potatoes, the witches were responsible. It was a fact not to be wondered at that every one of these believers in witches believed the "world to be flat." Many of them would have hung the supposed witches, as their ignorant forefathers did in an early day, if they had been possessed of the power. Two of the men swapped wives for a month or so, and it was all laid at the doors of those terrible witches.—Versay Reveille.

Big Beasts are Always Cowards.

The prevalent idea entertained by those not familiar with the real nature of our large carnivorous quadrupeds, believe their instinctive ferocity impels them to assault every person they meet, is not sustained by practical experience.

Those animals appear much more formidable in the distance than when approached in their own native wilds.

But few Eastern sportsmen would, it is believed, voluntarily attack a bear, wolf, or panther, yet I have seen and killed many of these animals, and not one of the them ever turned upon me.

And in further corroboration of this, my guide, "Little Bat," who has during his lifetime killed over eighty grizzlies, assured me that all he ever met invariably ran from him.

So confident was he of his ability to cope with those much dreaded monsters that he did not hesitate to hunt them when alone and on foot, and only two years ago he encountered four grizzlies eating a dead elk upon Casper Mountains, when he crawled to within a short rifle range and shot every one of them without moving from his tracks; and upon another occasion, while we were hunting in the valley of the Big Horn, he went out alone during a moonlight night and shot two grizzlies from behind the tree.

Panthers and wolves are most arrant cowards, and the traditional story of Gen. Putnam having performed an extraordinary feat of courage by entering a cave and shooting a wolf is extremely laughable when contrasted with the fact that my wife upon one occasion, in the night time at a frontier post, when a large black wolf had purloined one of her turkeys and was dragging it off, hurried out and with a stick made him drop the bird and run away.—Outing.

Death of a Famous Commander.

A Gainesville (Ga.) dispatch announces the death of Capt. Daniel G. Candler of the famous Banks county guards. Banks county was always noted for its freedom from the conventionalities of society, and its inhabitants could not brook enforced restraint. When the war broke out the Banks county boys organized a company, and an odd company it was, entirely democratic in its make-up, and with little respect for shoulder straps. As it was necessary to have a captain the local school-master, Daniel G. Candler, was elected to that office. Captain Candler knew the importance of his office, but he also knew the nature of his men, and he adopted a military code of his own, which, while not approved by military tacticians, was the only code which the Banks county guards would recognize.

"Gentlemen," the captain would say, "you will be kind enough to accompany me into the battle to-morrow."

"Gentlemen, please come to attention."

"Swing around, like a gate—swing!"

"March oblique, like a worm fence."

"In a straight line, like a tater row—git!"

"Will my kind friend in the first four hold up his head?"

Such excessive regard for the feelings of his men made Candler a successful captain. His men would have died for him because he was not "stuck up" like the other officers. Many of the stories told of Capt. Candler's peculiar commands are, of course, exaggerated, but they are all based upon the fact that the company was extremely democratic and that Capt. Candler was really a kind-hearted man. When the war was over these men were again Capt. Candler's neighbors, and loyal neighbors, too. The captain was born in Columbia county in 1812, and was the father of Congressman A. D. Candler.

THE FISHERY DISPUTE.

The British, Canadian, and American Commissioners Agree Upon Terms of Settlement.

A WASHINGTON telegram says the Fisheries Commissioners completed their labors on Wednesday. A treaty was signed which it is believed will result in a satisfactory settlement of the disputes that have existed for almost a century between this Government and Great Britain over the North Atlantic fisheries. Before the treaty can take effect it must have the ratification of the Queen of Great Britain, the Dominion of Canada, and the Province of Newfoundland, as well as of the Senate of the United States. Although the treaty will not at present be made public, it can be stated that it relates exclusively to the disputes concerning the fisheries of the North Atlantic coast, and does not include any provisions concerning the Behring's Sea trouble or commercial reciprocity. The treaty, it may also be added, does not contemplate the admission of fish into the United States free of duty.

...some twenty feet from the ground, thereby offering no hindrance to the cultivation of fields over which it may pass. Cars pointed at both ends are run on two tracks having also an upper or third rail, which acts in the two-fold capacity of a guide-rail and the conductor of the electric current. Each car is provided with an upper or guide wheel at each end. The flanges inclose the upper rail on each side, thus rendering the jumping off the track a matter of impossibility. The motive power consists of a permanent generator of sixty horse power located at each end of the line, from which the current passes to the induction rail, where it is immediately taken up by the traveling motor, to which one or more cars may be attached. The whole train is automatic in its action, each car applying its own brakes. By the proposed line Baltimore newspapers, mail matter or express packages would reach Chicago in about two hours. Chicago is distant from Baltimore 801 miles by rail. Matter from San Francisco for New York would be nine hours in transit.

SLAIN BY BURGLARS.

Amos J. Snell, a Chicago Millionaire, Shot Down in His Own Residence.

He Meets Death While Defending His Property Against Midnight Marauders.

The Terrible Crime Produces a Great Sensation in the Garden City.

[Chicago special.]

Amos J. Snell, the millionaire real estate owner and acknowledged wealthiest landed proprietor on the West Side, was shot dead in the hallway of his brown-stone residence at the corner of Ada street and Washington boulevard, Wednesday morning, at about 2 o'clock. Two bullets entered his body, one in the brain and the other in the heart. Either wound would have produced instant death. He was found

...of the premises was made. Upon investigation it was found that the burglars—there were two of them, as the footprints in the snow would indicate—had attempted to force an entrance into the house of George H. Brooks, who lives at 151 Washington boulevard, three doors west of the Snell mansion. The supposition is that they had made a mistake in the house they intended to burglarize, and retracing their steps the tell-tale snow clearly showed that they climbed the intervening fences and entered the yard of Mr. Snell from the rear, climbing the fence close by the barn. The storm door was unfastened, and with a half-inch bit several holes were bored in the thin panel close to the safety latch. With a heavy instrument the weakened panel was broken in, and it was but an easy matter for one of them to insert his hand in the opening and pull back the bolt and the latch. Once inside the murderers made their way to Mr. Snell's office, a small room in the front of the building, facing Washington boulevard, and commenced their work on the safe supposed to contain Mr. Snell's valuables.

CLEVER MEN IN THEIR BUSINESS.

It was here that their work clearly denoted that they were experts in their line of business. Two holes were drilled in the door of the safe just below the combination. Before drilling the second hole clear through, the burglars discovered that the safe was not locked, it being the custom of Mr. Snell to leave the door unfastened, as whatever valuable papers he might have on hand were kept in an inner compartment, a small, soft-metal affair a trifle larger than a cigar-box. The rivets were closely removed and the face of the compartment taken off. In this box were $2,000 worth of Cook County warrants and two checks, one for $2,-207.61, drawn in favor of Mr. Snell by A. J. Stone, his son-in-law. Mr. Stone is the manager of Mr. Snell's property, and it is his custom to collect all the rents, which he banks in his own name, giving his father-in-law his own personal checks for the amounts.

These were taken by the thieves, who next went into the dining-room, and after searching the closets they secured all the silverware, which they piled up in a heap on the dining-room table so that it could easily be carried away in case they were disturbed in their operations.

BLAINE WILL NOT RUN.

The Maine Man Announces that He Can Not Accept the Nomination.

The Chairman of the National Republican Committee Makes the Letter Public.

[Pittsburgh telegram.]

Mr. B. F. Jones, Chairman of the National Republican Committee, has received a letter from Mr. Blaine declining to allow his name to be presented to the National Republican Convention as a candidate for the Presidency. Following is Mr. Blaine's letter in full:

FLORENCE, Italy, Jan. 25.

B. F. Jones, Esq., Chairman of the Republican National Committee:

SIR: I wish through you to state to the members of the Republican party that my name will not be presented to the National Convention called to assemble in Chicago in June next for the nomination of candidates for President and Vice President of the United States.

I am constrained to this decision by considerations entirely personal to myself of which you were advised more than a year ago. But I can not make the announcement without giving expression to my deep sense of gratitude to the many thousands of my countrymen who have sustained me so long and so cordially that their feeling has seemed to go beyond the ordinary political adherence of fellow-partisans and to partake somewhat of the nature of personal attachment. ...

NATIONAL LAW-MAKERS.

What Is Being Done by the National Legislature.

WHEN the bill requiring the subsidized railroads to maintain and operate separate telegraph lines came up in the House of Representatives on the 9th inst., Mr. Anderson, of Kansas, the author of the bill, vigorously supported it. The railroad companies had bartered away their franchises by entering into a contract with the Western Union by which the railroad companies refused to perform their telegraphic services, and by which they gave the Western Union absolute monopoly over the western half of the continent. Through the genius of the most unscrupulous pirate of the century, Jay Hawk Gould, that monopoly had been created. The pending bill was simply a proposition to inject a little bit of God's breeding justice between the people and Jay Gould. The people of the country were praying for relief from the merciless grind of the most extravagant, ... unscrupulous, political set of incorporated scoundrels on the continent. This bill was a square blow between the eyes of Mr. Gould, the Western Union monopoly, and each of the Pacific Railroad companies. In the Senate Mr. Manderson, from the Committee on Printing, reported a joint resolution for the disposition of undistributed copies of the records of the rebellion, the reports of the tenth census, and the report of the Public Lands Commissioner. The resolution gave rise to some discussion, but was finally passed. The Committee on Indian Affairs reported favorably the bill providing for the opening to settlement of the Sioux Indian reservations in Dakota. The President sent the following nominations to the Senate: Benjamin F. Wade, of Ohio, to be Marshal of the United States for the Northern District of ... Brooks, of California, to be Attorney of the United States for the Southern District of California.

What John Sherman Says.

BLAINE.

How His Letter of Withdrawal Is Interpreted by the Republican Leaders.

Opinions of Senators and Representatives Upon the Maine Man's Position.

They Are Generally Agreed that the Communication Is Sincere,

Though a Few Are Inclined to Think He May Yet Be Forced to Run.

Allison, Gresham, Sherman, Harrison and Sheridan Have Many Friends.

[SPECIAL WASHINGTON DISPATCH.]

Blaine's letter is looked upon by Congressmen and politicians here as opening the field to other Presidential candidates. In a hundred interviews not ten persons could be found who questioned its sincerity or doubted its effect. On the main question, whether it left Mr. Blaine's friends free to seek other alliances and give their support to Presidential candidates, there was an emphatic agreement that it did. A few New-Englanders were found who, like Senator Frye, insisted that events would show Blaine to be so much the strongest candidate that the convention would still feel bound to nominate him. Senator Farwell was almost alone in reading between the lines that Blaine wanted the nomination. The strongest evidence that the letter was received in entire good faith was the activity of the Presidential candidates who have heretofore been keeping in the background. They promptly came forth to seek the support of Mr. Blaine's lieutenants. From a party standpoint Blaine was almost universally praised for his course. Everybody agreed with Senator Cush Davis that it would stop the talk about Blaine's self-seeking at the expense of the party, while Senator Spooner's idea that notwithstanding Blaine's strength with the masses he had inevitably created enemies stronger than party loyalty was indorsed. This meant that the mugwumps and reformers of that ilk would have to admit that the true cause of their disloyalty to Republican principles was even deeper than their hatred of Blaine.

As to the candidates who would now come to the front no one doubted that for the next few weeks Sherman would be the leading one. No one doubted, either, that while coming a little nearer to the nomination than ever before, he would go wide of the mark. Allison's boom was given a big start, but its friends were not anxious to have it pushed just yet. They thought the better course would be to let public sentiment crystallize. It was agreed he was as strong as any one in the East, while his sympathy with the tariff ideas of Western Republicans would give him several State delegations in the Mississippi Valley. Cullom did not tell any one he was in the field, but Illinois people thought he had an eye on a Prairie State delegation. The most significant thing in all the talk was the strong undercurrent for Phil Sheridan.

Senator Stewart, of Nevada, being interviewed, said: ...

Representative Cutcheon, of Michigan—It was quite the proper thing for Mr. Blaine to do. Nowhere in the letter does he state that he will not be a candidate. It simply means that Blaine will not force himself upon the party, but that if his party wants to nominate him he will accept. That is just what Mr. Blaine wants.

Representative Allen, of Michigan—Mr. Blaine is out of the race, and in my opinion his letter means that he is too sick a man to stand another campaign. No other inducement would cause him to retire from the field. He is as strong, or more so, in Michigan than any other Republican. Either Allison or Gresham would make a strong run in Michigan, and will loom up prominently for the nomination.

Senator Wilson, of Iowa—There can be but one fair interpretation put upon the letter. An announcement, made in the positive manner that Mr. Blaine used, means that he is sincere in his desire not to be a candidate this year. He probably has good reasons for his action, and the Republicans will take his letter as a final declination in advance of the nomination. Mr. Blaine's withdrawal will, I think, add strength to the candidacy of Senator Allison, whom the State of Iowa will present and support in the most enthusiastic and earnest manner possible.

Representative Hoar, of Iowa—The letter suits me first rate. I indorse it from beginning to end. I believe Mr. Blaine has done the wisest thing for himself and for his party by withdrawing from the canvass, and that his action will strengthen Republicanism throughout the country. While Iowa has always been a strong friend of Mr. Blaine, it will now be free to urge the candidacy of Senator Allison as that of the one man who can unite the entire West for the Republican ticket.

Congressman McComas, of Maryland, said there could be no doubt that Blaine is sincere in declining to be a candidate. If he had waited until after the delegates were elected it might be different. "I am in favor," said McComas, "of the nomination of any man who can carry the close States, and I find that is the general feeling among Republicans. I tell you, sir, the Republican party is in a healthier condition now than it has been for years, and we shall elect the next President."

Congressman Henderson, of Iowa—That is a strong document and he means what he says. Mr. Blaine presents clearly and truthfully the present probabilities for the Republican party in 1888. The Blaine men are not likely to go in a body for any candidate. In my own judgment Allison would be the man to bring all the elements of the party into line; and I believe the Republicans will nominate the man who will be elected."

Senator Hawley, of Connecticut, was asked if he considered the letter as final. He said: "I do—most assuredly I do. I think he means every word he has written. There can be no doubt as to the sincerity of Mr. Blaine in this matter. Circumstances may arise that will compel his friends to refuse this as a final answer from Mr. Blaine, but that no one knows anything about."

Congressional Delegate Dubois, of Idaho—Blaine is our first choice, but now that he has declined to become a candidate, I think Senator Cullom will be preferred. He is sound on the silver question, as we see it, sound on the Chinese question, and we look upon him as the champion of our views on the fight against the Mormons. I am satisfied that our people will settle down upon him as the right man, and I have no doubt he could carry the Pacific coast.

Senator Davis, of Minnesota, says it is a frank, honest withdrawal of Mr. Blaine's candidacy, made, as he believes, in the best interests of the Republican party.

Senator Blair, of New Hampshire—Mr. Blaine undoubtedly means what he says; but, in my opinion his declination is a misfortune to the Republican party, because nobody else can get as many votes as he would.

Senator Teller, of Colorado—Mr. Blaine is entirely sincere, and I believe party harmony will be promoted by his action. I believe he could be nominated if he would but say the word, and he knows that he could; but he knows that there is an element of the party that opposes him, and, to promote harmony, as he hopes, he voluntarily declines.

Senator Mitchell, of Oregon, says he regards the letter as sincere, but he does not believe that it takes Blaine out of the race. He thinks that should the Republican party call on him he would not refuse to enter the race.

Senator Paddock, of Nebraska, thinks Blaine's letter will be a disappointment to his strong support in Nebraska, but he looks upon it as a political utterance from a man who is sincerely desirous of the success of the Republican party. "Its effect will not, however, be detrimental," he said, "to the party's interests in Nebraska, as we will carry the State for any Republican nominated. There is a preference," he added, "in our State for a ..."

"THE LAND OF CANAAN"

Which the American Horticultural Society Indorses with Enthusiasm.

SAN JOSE, Cal., Jan. ..., 1888.

When the American Horticultural Society, in session at Cleveland, Ohio, last year, voted to hold their eighth annual session at San Jose, California, they "builded better than they knew." That is the universal testimony of the delegates here who, by coming, have escaped the terrible blizzards raging east of the Rocky Mountains, and at the same time have come to the spot where Horticulture is on its native heath, and challenges comparison with the world, without fear of the result.

San Jose, where the Association has just held its session, is the county seat of Santa Clara County, and the center of all the Santa Clara Valley. Its Mexican history dates back over one hundred years, but Mexican history was a half-civilized, non-progressive era, which does not count for much, and no Californian town has a history worth recording earlier than '49. It is notable that the spot where San Jose is located attracted attention at an early date, both from the Mexicans and Americans. The Mexicans were attracted there in 1777, and the Jesuits located a mission at Santa Clara, three miles distant, the same year.

When, in 1849, the gold discoveries attracted Americans in large numbers to California, San Jose was instantly recognized as an advantageous point. Consequently, the first constitutional convention, which convened at Monterey, the temporary capital, selected San Jose as the capital of the State, and the first California Legislature met in this city. In those early days the capital was a great ...

Mr. Wilcox said the soil of a great part of Santa Clara County was inexhaustible. In boring artesian wells it had been found that a good garden soil extended to a depth of over five hundred feet. Five crops of alfalfa could be produced in one year without materially diminishing the production. As much as eighty-five bushels of wheat had been raised to the acre, but small fruits, etc., were found to be more valuable, and people quit raising wheat. He had raised, he said, 1,000 pounds of onion seed from two acres.

At various stages of the proceedings there were similar developments, showing that the labor and care required for the production of fruit in the East was very much more than in California, and the Californians, being on their native heath, clinched their arguments by citations and illustrations of practical experience.

AT HORTICULTURAL HALL.

The people of San Jose have erected a permanent building, 80 feet wide by 100 feet long, in which to make the Citrus and Horticultural exhibits. The proceedings of the National Association were made especially interesting by having a Citrus Fair in progress at Horticultural Hall at the same time. Though held at the most unfavorable time of the year the Eastern visitors were greatly ...

[CHICAGO CORRESPONDENCE.]

"We are going to have one of the greatest seasons in base ball and general outdoor sports," said Captain Anson, of the Chicago Club, to your correspondent the other day, "that this country has known for many a long year. I have watched the feeling of the public closely during the past five or six months, and I tell you that not in all of my experience as a ball player have I ever seen the same interest displayed by the general public in everything pertaining to athletic contests. Just look at the boom that has struck amateur athletics in this city of late. I expected it would come, sooner or later, but 'pon my word I did not expect to see it come with ...

Considering the inclemency of the weather we were pleasantly dissapointed in the large number gathered in the parlors of Mr. and Mrs H. Lee Iddings last Friday evening. The programme consisted of an instrumental solo by Mrs. Iddings; a select reading by Mrs. Grier; the paper on "The Reign of Charles I" was renderreb by Dr. Carlstein. An instrumental solo by Mrs. Gayles. Mr. Brown and Miss Buttars conversed on "Woodstock". The next meeting will be held at the residence of A. Buttars. The paper on "The Reign of Charles II" to be read by Rev. A. O. Downs. The conversation on "Peveril of the Peak" to be led by A. Buttars and Miss Celia Nicholls.

THE RAILROAD.

President Cherrie Returns and Submits to an Interview on the Subject.

A little more than a year ago the D. C. & E. R. R. Co. was organized, and but about six months have elapsed since it became a legal corporation under the State law.

The officers and directors have during this time directed their energies toward the consummation of the project, and thus far matters have progressed as satisfactorily as could be expected under the conditions that have existed. President Cherrie has made two trips to New York in the interest of the scheme, and from all sources we have had continued and reliable assurances that the road is to built as soon as the necessary preliminaries are perfected.

Notwithstanding these well authenticated reports, there have been croakers abroad, who have cast discredit upon everything, and while Mr. Cherrie was in New York recently successfully negotiating, reports were in circulation that the entire project had fallen through.

In the days of 1879 we had the same kind of croakers, but Charlevoix has a harbor. In this year of our Lord the croakers may croak, but Charlevoix will have a railroad.

We are officially authorized to state that there has been absolutely no foundation for such talk, and that arrangements are now in course of perfection which will insure active operations in the spring. The bonds are being printed and will be negotiated.

President Cherrie returned from New York last week, and our reporter interviewed him on Saturday. In the course of the talk he said:

"We are going to have the road. Everything is working all right, and every step taken counts; every move has been made in the right direction. The men who are to put the money into the concern are satisfied that everything we have done is legal. We could not possibly have made things move faster than we have done. This is an extensive enterprise, and every New York capitalist is not going to grab at it in a moment. I have been able to prove to them thus far that what we have done has been carefully and rightly done, and of course you know a million dollars does not grow on every bush. This is a large affair, and is going to take $2,000,000 before the road can be finished. Now, moneyed men in New York are interested in this thing, for it is going from mouth to mouth that Northern Michigan people want a railroad. You can't go to them with a mark on a strip of paper and tell them it is the proposed route for our road. They want to know whether the thing is going to pay or not; what the products of the country are and how extensive. To this end I have compiled the business of every lumbering establishment from Kalkaska the the straits. You cannot state it too strongly to the people that we are going to have a road. Those people who are kicking and croaking about the way things are moving, what amount have they invested in the thing? If any of them think they can do the work better or faster than we are they can take hold. Mr. Beardslee is in Chicago getting up plans for the different stations and bridges, as he can work to better advantage there than here."

Mr. Cherrie leaves for New York again this week to continue the work of negotiating the bonds.

A feature of the situation which substantiates the statement of Mr. Cherrie is the fact that outside capitalists who have interests in Northern Michigan, have gone to first sources for information, and have faith that the road will be built. Walker & White, the St. Johns brokers, write to Secretary Eaton that they "have information from inside sources that the road will be built."

And it will be built.

Recollections of Grant.

BY CHARLES HENRY WEBB.

"I KNEW him well," the old man said,
"We were together in field;
I with the Left when the charge was led—
The General, of course, had the Right.

"I stood by his side," the old man said,
"When a bullet whizzed down the line;
Scarce forty feet from the General's head—
And but little farther from mine.

"Did I blench at the storm?" the old man said,
"Ah sir, the bravest may;
And from childhood up I've been always afraid
Of finding myself in the way."

"Shall I write thee down, O hero," I said,
"As a friend of the fallen chief,
And blazon thy name beside that of the dead
In a glorious alto-relief?"

"Nay, his friends were many," the old man said,
"A greater distinction I want.
Just say I'm the one who when all was done
Wrote no 'Recollections of Grant!'"

Fearful Work of the Sabbath Cyclone on the Little City of Mount Vernon.

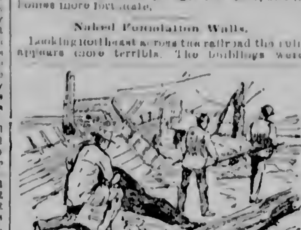
Three Hundred Buildings Ruined, Thirty-six People Killed, and Scores Wounded.

Nearly Fifteen Hundred People Rendered Homeless by the Awful Calamity.

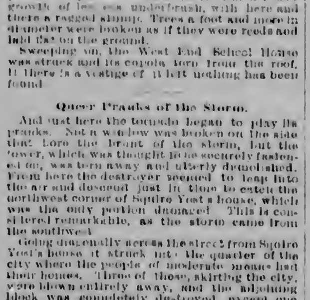
A Correspondent's Graphic Description of the Scenes of Desolation and Death.

[Mount Vernon (Ill.) special to Chicago Daily News.]

The world at large has already been informed that the town of Mount Vernon, the beautiful little capital of Jefferson County, has been visited by a great calamity, but what has been printed gives but a feeble idea of what has befallen the 4,000 people who had their homes here. When the sun rose, bright and beautiful Monday morning, it revealed a sight that wrecked the stoutest heart and made even the most hardened express feelings of sorrow for those who had lost their lives or their friends and the still greater number who had lost their homes and their little fortunes. Even at this writing those who have attempted to count the dead and compute the loss in dollars and cents are unable to give accurate figures. The most reliable and accurate figures obtainable show that thirty-six people are now numbered among the dead who were alive and in good …



TAKING OUT THE DEAD.



AN IMPORTANT FACT.

An Easy Cure for Weak, Tired, and Nervous Feelings.

Persons complain that they are weak, tired, and exhausted; they have no appetite, no strength, no life or ambition to work, they become irritable, cross, blue and discouraged; in some cases there are pains and aches in various parts of the body, and there is often indigestion, dyspepsia, belching of wind, dull head and general dispirited feeling. Sleepless, restless, and wakeful nights follow. Neglect of these symptoms results in excessive nervous prostration or paralysis, with numbness, trembling, cold feet and legs, prickling sensation and weakness and weariness of the limbs.

Thousands become prostrated, paralyzed or insane by neglecting the first symptoms, not knowing that the nervous irritability, gloom of the mind, loss of memory, nervous weakness and depression show an exhaustion of nerve force which will, unless the proper restorative remedy is used, result in utter mental collapse and absolute prostration of nerve and physical power.

Save yourselves from these terrible results while there is yet time by the use of that wonderful nerve invigorator and health restorer, Dr. Greene's Nervura Nerve Tonic. It is a purely vegetable remedy, and may be used by children or the most delicate invalids with absolute certainty of cure. Its effects are truly wonderful, and it is only necessary to use it to be convinced of its marvelous restorative and strength-giving powers. Do not fail to use this remedy, for it is the greatest medical discovery of the century, and an absolutely certain cure will result. All druggists keep it. Price $1 per bottle. Be sure and get Dr. Greene's Nervura Nerve Tonic; take no other, for this remedy has no equal. If your druggist does not have it, he will get it for you. Its discoverer, Dr. Greene, 35 West 14th street, New York, the great specialist in curing nervous and chronic diseases, can be consulted free, personally or by letter. Use his great remedy and write him about your case.

MENTAL TRASH FOR SMALL BOYS.

An Expert Tells How Sensational Stories Are Put Together.

"The writing of fiction for the young has become an important branch of literature," said an old writer, whose charming stories have tickled a generation of young people. "It seems sim- …

… and then suddenly sprung at each other. One was dexterously thrown; and the pair retired, to be followed by another. Each endeavored to throw his antagonist or to push him out of the ring, the audience looking on with great interest. Presently the wrestlers took up their gear, shouldered their poles, and started off to perambulate the town. Their place was taken by a large party of men, each of whom had a huge carp depicted on his gown, dragging or pushing along a full-sized model of a fishing-boat running on wheels. The boat was occupied by about ten youngsters, some of whom were belaboring a huge drum, others smaller ones. The men pushed the boat backward and forward, and then twirled it round and round on a vertical axis, till it seemed that its occupants must suffer worse agonies than those of sea-sickness, but they did not appear to be distressed. The boat was then wheeled away and its place occupied by a rapidly put together stage, with three very simple and yet well-designed and well-painted drop scenes. Half a dozen juvenile actors in huge wigs and gorgeous dresses of silk and embroidery disembarked from the boat and took their places on the stage. Several comic pieces were represented, giving great amusement to the audience. As I could not understand them I began to study the spectators. Overhead was a cloudless blue sky, and the whole lively scene was flooded with brilliant sunshine, the predominant color of the crowd was buff, relieved by the white uniforms of some police officers and by the brilliant yellow dresses of a few Chinamen.—St. James Gazette.

CHARLEVOIX, MARCH 7, 1888.

Congressman Cutcheon, who is a member of the house committee on military affairs, said recently that in his opinion there will be reported from the committee a bill for the reorganization of the army. Mr. Cutcheon thinks that it will contain a clause to provide for three battalions for each infantry regiment in time of peace and four battalions in case of war. "The bill will make such a radical change in the military establishment of the army," continued Mr. Cutcheon, "that I doubt very much whether it can pass the present congress. There is urgent need for some such measure and the military affairs committee appreciated this, but the fear of increasing the military establishment is so strong in the minds of a great many members of the house that it is doubtful if enough can be induced to vote for any such bill if it should be brought up.

A rumor comes from Washington to the effect that Don M. Dickinson will not live long in official life, as "he is already wearing under the strain." His nervous tension must be very strong indeed; for Don not only holds down the Postmaster Generalship, but directs the policy of the party, to a considerable extent, by virtue of his position on the Democratic National Committee. The tremendous pressure of civil service reform principles is not sufficient to induce Don to resign either office; but physical weakness may possibly render necessary that which "reform" is unable to accomplish.

It is now predicted that the president will sign the dependent pension bill, which is now pending in congress and quite sure to pass both houses. If he does it will be a square back-down from his former veto, and the true explanation of that will be: "As a candidate for re-election I cannot afford to do otherwise." In other words, it will be because he fears the soldier vote; not because he has any more love or consideration for the soldiers than he had a year ago.

This is what ails the Mugwump journals: They made Mr. Blaine's nomination a shallow pretext for deserting the Republican party. They are committed to the free-trade policy of President Cleveland. Mr. Blaine's withdrawal leaves them without the shadow of an excuse for supporting Mr. Cleveland except free-trade. They find themselves exposed in their nakedness as free-traders, and they are agitated and looking about for fig leaves.

That great philanthropist, Mr. W. W. Corcoran is dead. The story of his life is a good one to read to the old and young, to the rich and poor—especially to the rich. Men of great wealth and small souls should study it well. It is a story of honest receipts and generous disbursements; of wealth getting and wealth giving; of constant well-doing and endless benefactions.

The postmaster general, Don M. Dickinson, is organizing the cross-roads postmasters of Michigan for the fight. One of them wrote asking: "What part shall I take in the election contest?" He replied: "All the rights of American citizenship are yours, and whatever you might do in that capacity will be approved by the department." Go it, Don.

The Detroit Tribune says: "The Republicans of Michigan were never more enthusiastic and earnest than to-day. They are ready to meet the enemy with all its free-trade guns in full blaze just as soon as the enemy draws up in line." And it may be said Republicans all along the line "are ready."

The Democratic national committee has fixed upon the 5th of June as the time and St. Louis as the place for the gathering of the Democratic clans. The Democratic convention will be held two weeks earlier than the Republican convention.

What astonishes Democrats most is that several prominent Republicans decline the nomination for the Presidency. A Democrat would have to be dead and buried six weeks before he would do such a thing.

Washtenaw county no longer stands alone in the "wet" column. Iosco county, Thursday, voted against prohibition by a majority of between 500 and 600. A heavy vote was polled.

The Detroit Evening News has been enlarged by adding a column to each page, a new press has been bought and set up, and lots of new machinery has been added.

Washtenaw is the first county in the state to vote against prohibition under the local option act. Public sentiment there goes the other way by over 1,500 majority.

Northern Michigan News

Only a mixed train, one train each way per day, is run to and from Cadillac, on the new road.

Big Rapids, Chase, and Reed City are trying to secure the permanent location of the Big Rapids camp meeting.

It is rumored that White & Fryant are about to begin the manufacture of the large tract of pine lying east of Kalkaska.

The deepest well in Wexford county has just found fine water at 252 feet below the surface. It is in Selma township. It cost $350.

The rail road commissioner, last week, granted a permit to the Charlevoix rail road to put in crossings on the line of the G. R. & I. at Kalkaska and Petoskey.

C. A. Newton, of Elk Rapids, talks of renting his livery business and going to the Upper Peninsula where he can find wider scope for the exercise of his genius.

Col. Litchfield is fitting up the vacant store near Henika's on east Mitchell street, Petoskey, and putting in suitable appliances for the manufacture of his patent snow plow.

A Washington dispatch states that the Department has refused the request of Congressman Fisher to establish mail service between Cross Village, St. James and Harbor Springs.

The Gages are in trouble at Sault Ste Marie. Mrs Gage has brought suit for divorce, but Mr. Gage declares that he and the woman were never married, and there the matter rests at present.

W. Castler, of Cadillac, is constructing an ice house 50x150, in which he will store 3,000 tons of ice for local use. The G. R. & I. Railroad Company has also built an ice house at that place 48x105 in which they have stored 1,800 tons for their use.

Freeman Lavallay, who was arrested near East Jordan lately by officer Pratt for circulating obscene literature, had his examination before Commissioner Call at Petoskey last week, and was held for trial in the United States Court at Grand Rapids. In default of $500 bail, he was locked up.

The officials of the Toledo, Ann Arbor & North Michigan, and the Toledo, Ann Arbor & Cadillac Railway Companies met at Cadillac last week. A consolidation of the two roads was effected, the former company to control the line. Through passenger trains will begin running about May 1st.

Traverse Bay Eagle: The co-partnership heretofore existing under the firm name of Pratt, Hatch & Davis has been dissolved. Mr. Hatch retiring. The business here will be carried on here by Messrs. Pratt & Davis. Mr. Hatch goes to Grand Rapids where he will open a law office at 23 and 24 Widdicomb building.

David Ward's shrewdness has often been narrated, and he is said to be one of the old dogs who is full of new tricks. It is claimed that when he saw a butter dish factory erected at Mancelona, he calculated upon the amount of timber which that industry would require, and quietly bought all the adjacent timber he could get, and the owners of the factory will be compelled to buy from him at a good price.

Phillip Meg-ah-ba-was-ee-naw-quam, a 14 year Indian boy of Cross Village, says the Independent-Democrat, while wrestling recently, swallowed a 5-cent mouth organ which he held in his mouth, and now at meal time, when he opens his mouth the air is driven down his throttle with such force that the tune "When the Swallows Homeward Fly" can be heard as it vibrates in his stomach. He is doing well, and thinks some of swallowing another, so as to play the piece with the variations.

The Enterprise tells us of a singular accident that happened in Leelanaw county as follows: "Dr. Brady was called yesterday to Mr. A. P. Solon's place, in Suttons Bay township, to extract a knitting needle from Mrs. Solon's foot. It appears while moving hastily across the room (without shoes) last Tuesday, her foot came in contact with the needle, which was lying on the floor; and entering just beneath the little toe, took an angling course inward, penetrating to the heel, one-third to one-half breaking off in the foot."

Elk Rapids Progress: This town is so badly torn up over spites and jealousies that it is almost unbearable unless one seeks consolation in ones best friends—books. We presume it is always so in small towns. ——The other day as a lady was coming out of the Lake View House she slipped and fell. Mr. Denahy, who was standing near talking with C. A. Newton, stepped forward and said: "Shall I assist you? Did you fall?" "It's likely I fell!" she said, as she nursed her tongue, which was almost bitten in two. "Beg your pardon," said Mr. Denahy, "I thought you sat down to play with Newton's dog." which was playfully jumping around.

Sherman Pioneer: Last week we [illegible] Ashley, Jr., of the T., A. A. & N. M. R. R. He started for Frankfort Thursday morning accompanied by H. B. Sturtevant, returning Friday evening. Some of the Frankfort people seem to feel quite independent about railroad matters and do not care whether Mr. Ashley's road comes there or not unless they can get two or three prices for what they have done on the railroad business. They are standing in their own light unless they change their tactics soon they find themselves completely side-tracked before they know it. Mr. Ashley will go to New York soon and if satisfactory arrangements can be made with the capitalists who are backing him in his railroad building he will push out of Cadillac in the spring either for Manistee, Frankfort or Traverse City.

Grand Rapids Democrat: A report was received by the Democrat from Luther yesterday stating that the C. & W. M. railroad company had purchased the road bed and right of way of the new line from Frankfort to Sherman, Wexford county, for $50,000, and that the company intended building a connecting link from Baldwin to Sherman. Railroad rumors from that region are frequent owing to the probabilities of the C. & W. M., G. R. & I. and Toledo & Ann Arbor roads pushing into the Manistee and Frankfort country. The G. R. & I. already owns a branch to Luther, Lake county, and the T. A. & N. M. reaches Cadillac. In reply to queries as to the latest in rail roads from that region the West Michigan officials said that no such transfer as reported had yet been made. The West Michigan would be extended to Manistee and Frankfort undoubtedly as soon as practicable, but it was as yet "a question of time."

Petoskey Record: The case of the United States against J. K. Ford and Stephen Miller for cutting pine upon homestead lands, was up before commissioner Call again yesterday. U. S. Attorney Goodwin proved that the timber had been cut off said lands and sold, but the evidence did not appear to show that there was any intent to realize from the timber without clearing up the land. Commissioner Call took the matter under advisement until next Saturday, and will then decide whether it is a proper case to go before the U. S. district court at Grand Rapids. ——Col. O. T. Booth has made very great improvements on his farm between Petoskey and Charlevoix during the past year, and has just completed a large 100 foot barn. He says he will in five years show as fine a farm as any in Michigan, and that inside of five years there will be a summer resort located there. The survey made last fall locates a station on his farm. ——Connable & Son are shipping out a ton of fish every day.

The Hon. C. B. Fenton, of Mackinac Island, says the Island is going to have a big boom next summer. Gen. Scammon, of Chicago, and his son-in-law, Mr. Jones, were going to build two of the finest houses on the Island. Two new unpretentious hotels and a large boarding house were nearly completed, so that over 500 more people could be accommodated than last season. The Grand hotel owners were also considering the building of another large hotel, but would probably defer it another year. When they get ready they will build on a lot in front of the Grand containing eight acres. The next encampment of the State troops will use this lot for parade and drill purposes in connection with the U. S. [illegible]. Their camp will be located on Senator Stockbridge's lot of twenty-two acres, west of the Grand. On account of lack of room the Military Board has decided to take but two of the regiments to camp at a time, each two remaining five days. Mr. Fenton also thought the boulevard around the Island would be completed this year.

Boyne Citizen: A letter from Mr. Fitzgerald to O. H. Marsh states that they intend commencing work on the furnace at Boyne Falls as soon as the snow goes off. ——Samuel Ward, an old settler, residing three miles east of Boyne Falls, died recently of lung fever. He was a good citizen, and greatly respected by his friends and acquaintances. ——Fire on Wednesday afternoon entirely destroyed a two story frame house, belonging to the Sheboygan Manufacturing Co, situated facing their mill, and occupied by Mrs. T. Kane. The fire caught from a defective flue in the second story and the family endeavored to put it out themselves before giving the alarm. When help arrived the fire was beyond the control of any appliances on hand, and attention was turned to save the household furniture, which was nearly all gotten out safely. Miss Mabel Kane, who has been sick and confined to her bed for some time, was carried from the house and has been rather improving in health since the fire. As far as can be learned there was no insurance on the building which is a total loss.

There is in an interior Massachusetts town much frequented by health seekers a hotel whose landlord is something of an autocrat, judging by these rules: "Do not ask servants to do anything you can do yourself. In Silesia, recently, a man was summoned before the magistrate for disturbing the slumbers of a citizen. The noise which disturbed his slumbers was the crowing of a cockerel. The wise magistrate decided that the man had a right to keep his cockerel, that a cockerel could not live without crowing, and the complainant was challenged to produce a cockerel which did not crow. The case was dismissed.

His Strange Choice.

They were sitting by the open fire-place together.

"Have you ever," she said, "looked into the philosophy of the east?"

"Somewhat."

"And do you believe in the transmigration of souls?"

"I think I do."

"Well, what would you like to be in the next life?"

"My darling, I should like to be a white horse."

Long time she sat and wondered why he made so strange a choice.

The Monkey Was For Sale.

A sun-burned, yellow-eyed individual walked into the taxidermist's store on Sudbury street yesterday morning, carrying under his arm a little brown, grinning-faced monkey.

Addressing the young man in the outer office, he said:

"That monkey is for sale, and don't you forget it."

"What has happened to make you go back on the monkey?" asked the man at the desk as he leaned back in his chair and glanced at the man with the monkey.

"Nothing much," said the owner of the monkey, "only this. You see, my wife was suddenly called away from home last Saturday night, and I had to dish out my own beans Sunday morning. I noticed that the monkey eyed me pretty closely, but I only thought that the intelligent beast noticed that I didn't go at it as if I was used to it. Well, I was called to the door, and when I got back the kitchen was a wreck. I'd planned to take breakfast there rather than in the dining-room. The latter had been spotted all over the window, the dishes were on the floor, and that infernal monkey was taking the beans out of the pot and throwing them over everything. But that wasn't the worst of it. When I went in the little cuss threw a bottle at my head and then followed it up by everything he could lay his paws on."

"So he's for sale now," observed the young man outside the rail. "Yes; want him?"

"I guess not; but, when you've got a second-hand cyclone, I'll talk with you."—Boston Globe.

Train's Peculiarities.

Riding up in the elevator with George Francis Train at the Palmer House one evening during the week a guest showed a photograph of his little daughter to the eccentric philosopher. "Ah, yes," said Train, "one of my little friends in Madison Square." Then he called the child's name and inquired after her health. "The little one," said her father, "used to come home every day with an orange or candy, or some trifle which she said Uncle 'Tain' gave her. Every one of the several hundred children who frequented the square Train knew by name. They were all fond of him. They would go to him instinctively without fear the first time they saw him. For months he sat in the square, never uttering a word to any creature but the children and the sparrows. The sparrows were also not afraid of him. Let an adult address him and George Francis would write his reply." A very old acquaintance of Train's says: "The matter with him is simply a desire for applause and notoriety. Hence his assumption of eccentricity. He is inordinately vain, but he may well be. He is a brilliant man, accomplished and read as few are. As a business man he is one of the keenest. When he wishes to talk business he is shrewd and quick and a fine figurer. He is remarkably quick to discern the value of a thing. Train introduced tramways (street railways) in Europe. His energy and address made a great impression on the English, whose business men are very slow to take up with Americans who meet them at their homes on business. There are a good many schemes among them, by the way. Train is said to have brought Turkish baths into western Europe. In this country he was one of the first men to pick out the towns which would profit most by the growth of the great west. He owned real estate enough in Omaha at one time to make him an enormously rich man. His acumen led him to pick it up. Meet him where he most lays aside his assumptions of [illegible] he is as smart as they make them."—Chicago News.

Witnessed An Execution.

"Talking of hanging," said a white-haired old gentleman the other night, in the hearing of a New York Commercial Advertiser reporter, when the conversation touched upon the subject of the condemned anarchists, "I talk about hanging. I had an experience when I was a boy that is as vivid to me to-day as when it happened."

"Well, what is it?" asked the reporter, ever ready for a story.

"You know I was born in Montreal and was about seven years old when the French-Canadian rebellion broke out. Three of the rebels were caught, tried and sentenced to be hanged. One of them was Jules Delacroix, an old man of 60, who occasionally did bit of work for my father. Jules had lost his right hand in some manner years before I knew him. It was cut off at the wrist, leaving a smooth rounded stump. I was present with the crowd on the day of the execution of three men, who were to be hanged together on the same gibbet, feeling a sort of proprietary interest in the whole affair on the strength of my acquaintance with Jules. The gibbet was made of two heavy uprights with a wide string-piece across the top over which the three ropes were thrown, for in those times they simply fastened the noose around a man's neck and pulled him up by hand and let him strangle to death, as they do at a western lynching now. One end of the gibbet was close to and nearly on a level with a shed on which I had taken my stand to witness the execution. Well, just as the soldiers were about to pull up the victims a boyish freak possessed me, and I climbed out on the string-piece, lying flat on my face, and crawled out to the first rope just as the victims were pulled up. It happened to be directly over Delacroix. As the rope was pulled, up came the writhing body of poor Jules until he almost touched the beam above him on which I crouched. They had tied his arms behind him, but in his death struggle he managed to pull the stump from its fastening, and, as he found it loose, threw it up and over the beam, and with desperate strength drew himself up, thus slackening the rope about his neck. I was looking down into his ghastly face, which was so close that I could have touched him with my hand. His wild, bloodshot eyes looked straight into mine with a pitiful, beseeching glance that haunts me to this day. "Ah, mon Dieu! mon Dieu!" he gasped. As a British soldier caught him by the feet and gave him a pull, his handless stump lost its hold on the cross-piece, and the poor wretch fell back to his death. No; I never think of a man's hanging but I recollect those wild, staring eyes, and hear the gasping supplication "Mon Dieu, mon Dieu!"

Diphtheria From Cats.

Cows are susceptible to infection with human scarlet fever, and, in turn, the same disease, which in the cow is very mild, may be and has been communicated to human beings by means of milk. Epidemics of human scarlet fever have been caused in this way, and we are told that in thirty years 543,000 deaths were caused by this disease in the United Kingdom, a large portion of them no doubt by infection from milk.

It is now established by the experiments of Dr. George Turner of London, that diphtheria can be had by cattle and communicated by them. Five years ago there was brought to him a pigeon which was supposed to have died of strangles; but dissection revealed in its windpipe a well marked membrane, just as one may see in the throat of a child who has died of croup. Other pigeons inoculated with this membrane had this disease. Three years later in several epidemics of diphtheria, it was learned that the chickens, turkeys and pheasants were suffering from a disease apparently identical with that which was killing human beings. "I have also seen," says Dr. Turner, "chickens and pigeons which had been inoculated with diphtheritic membrane from a child's throat attacked by a disease which in all respects resembled what I regard as natural fowl diphtheria."

In investigating an epidemic of diphtheria in 1886, Dr. Turner learned that in a cottage where the first case occurred a kitten had previously suffered from a throat disease and had died of it. Two cats had died in a village store and the proprietor afterward had diphtheria. The evidence is ample, also, that horses have diphtheria.

There is no doubt that diphtheria, as well as scarletina is communicated from man to animals and from animals to men. Mankind is exposed to great danger by reason of the ailments of domestic animals. The pet cat or the favorite dog or horse may be the means of bringing disease and perhaps death into the house. It behooves parents to see that their children are not allowed to play with or be near any domestic animal that has any throat trouble or any appearance of disease.—Good Housekeeping.

A Woman's Man, Not a Revolutionist.

"When August Spies was editor of the Arbeiter," said one who used to be Spies' chum and associate, "he was anything but sincere in his Socialistic beliefs. 'I don't care a snap about this Socialism business,' he used to say; 'I must make my living somehow, and if I did not edit the Arbeiter and lead the party somebody else would. I may as well do it as anybody.' Spies at one time drew three salaries—$25 a week as editor of the Arbeiter, $15 a week as secretary of the Socialistic Publishing Company, and $20 or $25 a week as business manager of the newspaper. He was then a brainy but light-hearted young man, his chief concern in life being, not Socialism or revolution, but one or more of the various love affairs which he always had on hand. He was a handsome, dashing fellow, had many admirers among the ladies, and for a time there was no pleasure in life so keen as that to be found in the making of a new conquest. Too much of an egotist to love anybody but himself very deeply, he still possessed the faculty of charming most of the young women whom he met.—Chicago Herald.

"An unfortunate mistake occurred in last week's edition," plaintively mutters a Custer county paper. "We referred to Mr. Takem, candidate for Sheriff on the opposition ticket, as a 'rough-hewn diamond.' It should have been 'ruffianly demon.'" We trust our readers will forgive the mistake.

A CANAL TO COST $5,000,000.

The Latest Scheme to Connect Lakes Michigan and Superior.

SOME months ago a plan was conceived whereby the distance by water from ports on Lake Michigan to Lake Superior could be reduced about 300 miles, says a dispatch from Escanaba, Mich. A party of capitalists considered the feasibility of the project, and about decided to carry the plans into execution. For unknown reasons, however, the matter assumed no definite shape. The proposed plan was to construct a canal connecting the two great bodies of water from the head of Big Bay de Noque, in Lake Michigan, to South Bay, in Lake Superior. The distance is forty miles. It is now authentically stated that New York and Minneapolis capitalists have revived the project, and that a survey will soon be made, locating a route with a view to commencing the construction of what would prove an important waterway. Competent engineers, whose attention has been directed to the plan, pronounce it perfectly feasible. Chicago, Milwaukee, Duluth, and Marquette would be particularly benefited by the proposed canal. The distance would be reduced fully one day. Besides, the dangerous passage through the Straits of Mackinac and the "Soo" would be avoided. The estimated cost of the canal is $5,000,000, and if sufficient capital can be secured, and the plan meets the expectations of those interested, the work will soon be inaugurated. Vessel owners and Captains speak highly of the scheme and pronounce it a grand achievement if perfected.

WILLIAM B. TASCOTT, the stylish, blue-eyed young burglar who murdered Amos J. Snell, the Washington boulevard millionaire, and sought safety in flight, has not yet been arrested, says a Chicago telegram of Monday.

He is still secure in his place of hiding, but an army of spies is on the watch for him, wherever he may be, and will follow him wherever he may go. The police say that he cannot escape. It is alleged that he was seen at Leaf River, Wis., and detectives have gone there to search for him. Sunday last there was arrested in this city the man who was Tascott's companion, who stood on guard on the outside of the Snell residence while the youthful burglar was inside committing murder, and this man has made a full confession. He places the guilt on William B. Tascott, against whom so much damaging circumstantial evidence has already been piled up. Tascott wanted him to engage with him in a life of crime. The night that the Snell burglary was to be committed this man and Tascott went to the house together. Tascott put on his felt slippers, and, after boring the holes to open the kitchen door, went inside to open the safe and secure the plunder. His accomplice remained outside, watching for the police, to prevent any interruption of the dangerous undertaking. He heard the shots fired and was alarmed, but remained at his post until Tascott came out. The latter was pale, excited and trembling. He grasped his friend by the arm and told him of the murder. Then the two skulked away together, and crept up the stairs to Tascott's lodgings at No. 471 West Madison street. The next morning they sneaked out and separated, when Tascott went to the Northwestern depot and boarded a train for Oak Park, where he has a brother and sister living. The accomplice was horrified by the murder, and so alarmed lest he might be arrested and held for complicity in the crime that he refrained from giving information to the police. He has made a sworn statement, and satisfied the police that he had no direct connection with the Snell murder, or with any other crime that was planned and executed by young Tascott. The name of this man is withheld at the earnest request of the police. The officers at the Central Station Sunday were all busily employed addressing and mailing to all parts of the world copies of the following revised circular, which gives the very latest description of the man wanted:

TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS REWARD.

DEPARTMENT OF POLICE, CITY OF CHICAGO, Feb. 18, 1888.—Look out for and arrest William B. Tascott, alias T. A. Cettinight, alias Moore, alias Scott, alias Clark, the supposed murderer of A. J. TEXT OF THE TREATY.

The President Sends the Document to Congress, Accompanied by a Message.

He Expresses Satisfaction with Its Provisions—Concessions to American Fishermen.

The Temporary Agreement Offered by the British Commissioners.

[Washington special.]

The Senate has made public the fisheries treaty, with the President's letter of transmittal. The President, in his letter transmitting the document to the Senate says:

"Especially satisfactory do I believe the proposed arrangement will be found by those of our citizens who are engaged in the open sea fisheries adjacent to the Canadian coast, and resorting to those ports and harbors under treaty provisions and the rule of international law.

"The proposed delimitation of the lines of the exclusive fisheries from the common fisheries will give certainty and security as to the area of their legitimate field; the headland theory of imaginary lines is abandoned by Great Britain, and the specification in the treaty of certain named bays especially provided for gives satisfaction to the inhabitants of the shores without subtracting materially from the value or convenience of the fishery rights of Americans. The uninterrupted navigation of the Strait of Canso is expressly and for the first time affirmed, and the four purposes for which our fishermen under the treaty of 1818 were allowed to enter the bays and harbors of Canada and Newfoundland within the belt of three miles are placed under a fair and liberal construction, and their enjoyment secured without such conditions and restrictions as in the past have embarrassed and obstructed them so seriously.

"Art. 5. Nothing in this treaty shall be construed to include within the common waters any such interior portions of any bays, creeks, or harbors as cannot be reached from the sea without passing within the three marine miles mentioned in article 1 of the convention of Oct. 20, 1818.

CHAPTER XX.

OLD RUBE and Lester Gray, still following the trail of the party that Rube persisted in thinking was the one that had carried away Nora, found themselves far up in the mountains one night, weary and hungry. Lester himself was much discouraged, though Rube preserved the even tenor of his way under all circumstances.

"I fear you have missed the trail," said Lester, viewing the tall pines and lowering mountains gloomily.

"Nary time, but they got a big start of us, was well mounted, an' knew the way like a book. 'Fore another day ends we'll be onto 'em, but I've an idee we'll hev to be mighty careful, or we'll not git off with the gal in a hurry."

"Why?"

"There has been a band o' road agents sunors in these mountains, the wust pests ever let loose on a feller, not exceptin' the redskins, an' so far there's only been one or two o' their party nabbed. I've an idee their hidin' place ain't far from here."

"You don't think that Nora fell into their treacherous, cruel powers? Oh, ...

...

That he was in great danger he was well aware, and that his chance of rescue was slight; yet he hoped much from Rube, and thanked his lucky stars that he at least had escaped.

"What a fool I was to push that rock off and get captured in this ridiculous way. Rube said these were Sioux, the wildest, wickedest tribe to be found in the Northwest. I can expect nothing less than burning at the stake. Alas! dear little Nora, are we never to meet on earth again?"

The Indians bound him securely and left him lying in the bottom of the canyon while they decided what was to be done with their captive, and wondered if he was alone in the mountains.

Two of their best men went to see if any friend had escaped, but returned...

I was not to lose heart. How these things cut into my flesh, but this is only the beginning. What the end will be God only knows."

CHAPTER XXI.

NORA was much disappointed at the sudden interruption to Skete's story of the past that she was so anxious to learn.

"It seems I'm never to know the truth, and the light is too dim to examine these papers; besides, it would not be wise to expose them to view here; cruel Jim Gregory, as he is called, might snatch them from my grasp. Ah, well, I may see Skete soon, when his story that was hardly begun may be completed."

But the next day dragged its weary length along, and she saw nothing of Skete.

"They must be keeping him from me purposely. Ah, perhaps that is he!"

A stealthy tread along the ground, and in the gloom she made out that the crouching figure was Skete's beyond a doubt.

"Miss Nora, honey!" he whispered.

"Yes, Skete," she replied as softly.

"You gather up de blanket an' follow me. Keep mum. Skete will explain it all. De way is dark; but trust to me, Miss Nora. We'll leab dese yere old mountains, sure."

Nora quickly complied. She understood that Skete contemplated flight, and she was only too glad to comply. Anything rather than the horror of her present condition, a captive in a rendezvous of road agents.

She threw the blanket over her shoulders and silently followed Skete's lead with cautious tread, well aware that sentinels were stationed all around them.

Once out in the mountains they moved...

THE ROAD TO HAPPINESS.

Dr. Talmage's Seventh Sermon to the Women of America.

"What Can and What Cannot Make a Woman Happy" His Subject—The Chief Aim of Life Should Be Usefulness—Mistakes of Young People.

BROOKLYN, Feb. 19. This morning the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., preached the seventh of his series of "Sermons to the Women of America, with Important Hints to Men." The opening hymn begins:

Then let our songs abound,
And every tear be dry;
We're marching through Immanuel's ground,
To fairer worlds on high.

Dr. Talmage took for his text the following words: "She that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth." He said:

The editor of a Boston newspaper, a few days ago, wrote asking me the terse questions. "What is the road to happiness?" and, "Ought happiness to be the chief aim of life?" My answer was: "The road to happiness is the continuous effort to make others happy. The chief aim of life ought to be usefulness, not happiness, but happiness always follows usefulness." This morning's text in a strong way sets forth the truth that a woman who seeks in worldly advantage her chief enjoyment will come to disappointment and death. "She that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth."

My friends, you all want to be happy. You have a great many recipes by which it is proposed to give you satisfaction. At times you feel a thorough unrest. You know as well as older people what it is to be depressed. As dark shadows sometimes fall upon the geography of the school-girl as upon the page of the spectacled philosopher. I have seen as cloudy days in May as in November. There are no deeper sighs breathed by the grandmother than by the granddaughter. I correct the popular impression that people are happier in childhood and youth than they ever will be again. If we live aright, the older the happier. The happiest woman that I ever knew was an octogenarian...

Suppose that a young woman expends the brightness of her early life in this unsatisfactory struggle and omits the present opportunity of usefulness in the home circle—what a mistake!

So surely as the years roll around, that home in which you now dwell will become extinct. The parents will be gone, the property will go into other possessions, you yourself will be in other relationships, and that home which, only a year ago, was full of congratulations, will be extinguished. When that period comes, you will look back to see what you did or what you neglected to do in the way of making home happy. It will be too late to correct mistakes. If you did not smooth the path of your parents toward the tomb; if you did not make their last days bright and happy; if you allowed the younger sisters of your family to come up without feeling that there had been a Christian example set them on your part, there will be nothing but bitterness of lamentation. That bitterness will be increased by all the surroundings of that home; by every chair, by every picture, by the old-time mantel ornaments, by everything you can think of as connected with that home. All these things will rouse up agonizing memories. Young women, have you anything to do in the way of making your father's home happy? Now is the time to attend to it, or leave it forever undone. Time is flying very quickly away. I suppose you notice the wrinkles are gathering and accumulating on those kindly faces that have so looked upon you; there is frost in the locks; the foot is not as firm in its step as it used to be; and they will soon be gone. The heaviest clod that ever falls on a parent's coffin lid is the memory of an ungrateful daughter. Oh, make their last days bright and beautiful. Do not act as though they were in the way. Ask their counsel, seek their prayers, and, after long years have passed, and you go out to see the grave where they sleep, you will find growing all over the mound something lovelier than cypress, something sweeter than the rose, something chaster than the lily—the bright and beautiful memories of filial kindness performed ere the dying hand dropped on you a benediction, and you closed the lids over the weary eyes of the worn out pilgrim. Better that, in the hour of your birth, you had been struck with organic ... and that you had been handed over into the cold arms of the world...

...sation elsewhere, sometimes feel called upon at the door of the drawing-room to drop their common sense and to dole out sickening flatteries. They say things about your dress, and about your appearance, that you know, and they know, are false. They say you are an angel. You know you are not. Determined to tell the truth in office, and store, and shop, they consider it honorable to lie to a woman. The same thing that they told you on this side of the drawing-room three minutes ago they said to some one on the other side of the drawing-room. Oh, let no one trample on your self-respect. The meanest thing on which a woman can build her happiness is the flatteries of men.

Again. I charge you not to depend for happiness upon the discipleship of worldliness. I have seen men as vain of their old-fashioned and their eccentric hat as your brainless top is proud of his dangling fooleries. Fashion sometimes makes a reasonable demand of us, and then we ought to yield to it. The daisies of the field have their fashion of color and leaf; the honeysuckle have their fashion of ear drop; and the snowflakes flung out of the winter heavens have their fashion of exquisiteness. After the summer shower the sky weds the earth with ring of rainbow. And I do not think we have a right to despise the elegancies and fashions of this world, especially if they make reasonable demands upon us; but the discipleship and worship of fashion is death to the body, and death to the soul. I am glad the world is improving. Look at the fashion plates of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and you will find that the world is not so extravagant, and extraordinary now as it was then, and all the marvelous things that the granddaughter will do will never equal that done by the grandmother. Go still further back, to the Bible times, and you find in those times fashion wielded a more terrible scepter. You have only to turn to the third chapter of Isaiah, a portion of the Scriptures from which I once preached to you a sermon, to read: "Because the daughters of Zion are haughty, and walk with stretched forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet: In that day the Lord will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet, and their cauls, and their round tires like the moon, the chains,...

INTRODUCTORY.

Close to the end of the long journey Christ teaches his disciples another lesson on true greatness, the method of preferment in the kingdom. It is not according to riches of strength or possession, but according to the spiritual riches of meekness and humility. It will not be out of place here to reprint in part the beautiful poem of the "Two Pilgrims."

"Two pilgrims came to a castle gate,
A gate locked fast and barred;
They paused awhile, for it was late,
And the journey had been hard.

"Two pilgrims, I say, yet all unlike,
For one with haughty mein
And kingly step paced up and down
The little strip of green.

* * * * * *

The warden came to the castle gate—
The gate locked fast and barred—
His glance searched keen the pilgrims thro',
His voice was cold and hard.

"'None but the rich can enter here'—
A struggling, hopeless sigh,
And he that lay by the castle gate,
Sank down as if to die.

A REGULAR FIRE-EATER.

A Countryman in Maryland Who Astonished People by Handling Hot Coals.

[Baltimore American.]

IT was in Denton, where Nathan once lived, that he first discovered himself to be Fire-proof. In his youth he was a servant in the house of Lawyer Purnell. Being in the kitchen a great deal, his inclination was to taste some of all the choicest dishes when the housekeeper's eye was turned, and one day he dipped his hand into a boiling pot to catch a dumpling. He got the morsel and relished it so much that he grabbed for another, and found that his hand was not hurt in the least. This pilfering process went on for some time, with no injury to the hand. The first public exhibition that Nathan made of himself took place in the bar-room of the local hotel, when he took live coals from the stove and held them in the palm till they had expired. Then followed, on different occasions, other more trying feats of endurance, such as whetting a hot poker on his hands or licking it with his tongue and holding it in his mouth, walking barfooted among live coals and on hot tires. At the trial of Fred Lawrence in Denton early in the '70s, after an adjourned session of court, Nathan greatly amused the judges and many spectators by his exploits, and at the hanging of Lawrence in Easton he was present and gave an exhibition which netted him $87. On this occasion he repeatedly took a mouthful of molten lead with no injury. Hundreds of colored men were present. Great was their consternation when they witnessed the performance. On all occasions Nathan turned his supernatural powers to profitable account. He would "eat fire" at any time, but never without hearing the jingle of money. Judge Stump once gave Nathan $5 for whetting a red-hot poker on his hand. The peninsular towns of Centerville, Church Hill, Easton, Hillsboro, and Greensboro, and others...

SHERMAN'S SPEECH.

Remarks of the Ohio Senator Before the Home Market Club of Boston.

The Benefits of Protection to American Labor and Capital Clearly Set Forth.

James Russell Lowell Taken to Task for Some Recent Misstatements.

Gentlemen, I have, first of all, to thank you for the hearty reception you have given to a stranger from a distant State; but a stranger akin to you by many ties of association, and, more than all, by a hearty sympathy with you in the line of public policy that has done more than any other to develop the resources and to promote the prosperity of our common country.

I like the name of your club, for it is a name that describes your principles; it is a creed in itself—home market for home productions. It has the flavor of patriotism. When you use the word "home" you do not mean your household, your business, not even Boston or Massachusetts, but your whole country from ocean to ocean, from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. The market you refer to is the interchange of the products of sixty millions of people, the most free, intelligent, and prosperous on the globe, engaged not merely in manufactures, but agriculture and commerce, and embracing almost every employment of civilized man. You use the phrase "home market" to distinguish it from the foreign market, not to exclude the foreign market, but to emphasize your preference for the home market as infinitely greater, more valuable, more productive than the foreign market.

The home market deals with over $8,000,000,000 annually of agricultural products, and $6,000,000,000 of manufactures, while the foreign market deals with only $1,500,000,000 of exports and imports annually, and more than half of these are home products. This is not all; every part of the capital and labor employed in the production of the home market is American labor and capital. These productions are by American farmers and workshops, and they are transported on American railroads, steamboats, and wagons. They are exchanged for each other by American merchants, tradesmen, and middlemen, and more than 90 per cent. of them is consumed by the American people. It is the home market that gives employment, life, strength, health, wealth, and comfort to the people of the United States. It is this home market that, I take it, you wish to foster, protect, and diversify.

On the other hand, our foreign market is conducted entirely by foreigners. Nearly one-half of it is in foreign products, made by foreign labor, largely by people whose daily wages would not buy the food, saying nothing about clothing and shelter, that is consumed by the American workingmen; and yet the price of all food is confessedly cheaper here than in Europe. These products are transported on foreign vessels; they are consigned mainly to foreign agents as a device to secure undervaluation, and, to a large extent, are consumed as articles of luxury and ornament. The aggregate of imported goods in the highest years of importation is less than 6 per cent of home products. More than one-third of this, the great body that enters into the consumption of our people, is free of duty, and the rest is only charged such reasonable duties as will incite home competition without destroying home industries.

As to our exports, mostly of food, when they leave our shores they are carried in foreign vessels, and are only taken to supply absolute wants. They are taken by our European neighbors as we take sugar from the West Indies, and coffee from Brazil, because they must have them. All the while they are trying to get cheaper wheat from India and Russia and cotton from Egypt. Even what they do take in the way of food is less than 7 per cent of our production, while the home market consumes the balance.

When I think of the contrast between our home market and our foreign market, in magnitude and proportions, the universal benefits of the one and the comparative unimportance of the other, I am led to wonder why so many gentlemen of education and character are willing to endanger the wonderful development of our home industries to increase our foreign commerce. I can excuse such professors as Mr. Sumner and Mr. Perry, whose theories exclude love of country and rest only upon the universal good of man. The most distinguished professor of this school of philosophy that I know of is Mrs. Jellyby, who devoted herself to the good of mankind, and, especially of Africa, to the neglect of her house, her husband and the little Jellybys. I believe the best we can do for mankind is to do the best for our country. I suppose that in Congress at least we are to legislate for the United States, and that on the question of home market or foreign market, we are to be guided by the interests of the people of the United States.

When you invited me to speak to the Home Market Club I learned that there was another club in Boston called the Massachusetts Tariff Reform League, and that its members had a banquet here recently at which there were many distinguished guests and speeches. So I naturally thought that here, at least, I might find a statement of the benefit of the foreign market and what is meant by "tariff reform." I carefully read all those speeches, and confess my surprise to find so little on economic questions affecting our home industry, and so much about politics. It is like Falstaff's bill of fare; so little bread and so much sack.

Take Mr. Lowell, for instance, a gentleman for whom I have always entertained the highest respect. He is known as an accomplished writer, a man of culture and taste, a welcome representative of this country at the English court. He was the President of the occasion, and gave tone and direction to it. I find but very little about the tariff in his remarks, but a good deal about Mr. Cleveland. He says:

"Personally I confess that I feel myself strongly attracted to Mr. Cleveland as the best representative of the higher type of Americanism that we have seen since Lincoln was snatched from us."

Thus Mr. Lowell, who has been honored by a great party with its confidence and trust, places Mr. Cleveland above Grant, the great soldier of our country; above Hayes, who certainly gave to the country a pure and excellent administration, and Mr. Lowell himself; above Garfield, one of the most accomplished of American statesmen, and above Arthur, in every respect a model gentleman and a prudent and able President.

Now, for what has Mr. Cleveland been distinguished to justify this eulogy? Two things—first, for the promise of civil service reform, and he has practiced the most general, sweeping removals in the public offices since the government was established. He found 2,359 Presidential Postmasters in office and he has removed or changed 2,000 of them. His Postmaster General, out of 52,000 employes under him has removed 40,000. Out of thirty-three Ministers abroad the President removed or changed thirty-three, a large proportion of whom are men distinguished in the war against the Union. Out of 56,000 places he has removed or changed 43,000, and out of the 43,000 there are not fifty Republicans among the appointees. No wonder the witty but cynical Mr. Stearns, one of these appointees, says: "Civil service reform received no aid from any public man to amount to anything until the advent of Mr. Cleveland." But it is the civil service that turns out all the "ins" and puts in the "outs." This is the kind of civil service reform practiced by Mr. Cleveland, and yet he is extolled by a gentleman who places civil service reform above all other objects of public policy.

The other ground named to justify this eulogy is the recent message of the President recommending that all taxes now existing on home products be continued and duties on imports be largely reduced.

The inevitable effect of this policy is to increase importations at the expense and loss of our home market, and especially to reduce the wages of all engaged in industries competing with foreign production. The message creates alarm among business men at home and gives joy and hope to every market in Europe. I have had occasion recently to answer this message, and do not care to repeat it here, but wish to reply to other remarks of our friends in the league.

Mr. Lowell says: "Never before has a Pandora's box so full of the germs of infectious demoralization been offered to any people as our growing surplus."

This is not true. A surplus is a great deal better than a deficit. And this surplus is not new. It has been growing since the close of the war. It has enabled us to perform the magnificent feat of rapidly reducing the public debt, a policy which has excited the admiration of the greatest statesmen of Europe. Mr. Gladstone said to me twenty years ago that this was as great a victory as success in war. This growing surplus was bequeathed to Mr. Cleveland by his predecessors, and was applied by them to the payment of debt and to repeated reductions of taxes. It is the rational and steady result of our increase in wealth and population growing out of the policy of protection to home industries. Our friends may be surprised that the surplus revenue did not stop with the election of a Democratic President, and perhaps it will if his advice is followed. Certainly it will if he checks the prosperity which enables us to import goods and pay taxes.

But why is not this surplus applied to the payment or purchase of the public debt? Whose fault is it that it accumulates in the Treasury? Plainly the fault of Mr. Cleveland, whose Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to apply this surplus at any time to the reduction of the public debt. If he had followed the example of his predecessors he would, weekly or monthly, without proclamation or noise, have purchased and retired the public debt under the main provisions of existing law.

But, if the President preferred to reduce the surplus by the reduction of taxation, why did he not apply to Congress to diminish taxation without disturbing home production? I know that at any time in the last Congress taxation could have been reduced but for the desire of the Speaker of the House and the President to strike at home industries rather than to reduce taxation. A majority of the House, though Democratic, would have passed in an hour a bill reducing taxation if it had been permitted by the Speaker to vote upon a reduction of internal rather than external taxes; and to-day, if the House is not packed to defeat its will, a bill to make all the reduction recommended by the President could be promptly passed. But the President and the controlling elements of his party are determined to use the exigency which he has created to force Congress to reduce taxes in their way, so as to strike a dangerous blow at our domestic industries; and it is because of this that he receives the high eulogy of Mr. Lowell.

Again, Mr. Lowell says "that the two great parties in Congress are unworthy of confidence;" that "with them it is a struggle between the ins and outs," and that "each appears to make use of the same unworthy tricks for its own advantage; each had an abundance of aces in its sleeve, and each was divided on the great questions of vital interest."

Now, as Mr. Lowell has never been a member of Congress and I have for many years, I must say that during all that time I have never seen the game played with aces in the sleeve. This is a figment of his imagination. The truth is that Mr. Lowell, though distinguished as a literary man, has no perception of the interests and business of this great Republic, of the men who, like you, develop its resources. He can not appreciate, as you do, the beneficial results of the policy of protection to the millions of our countrymen whose bread and life depend upon developed industries built up and supported alone by wise restrictions upon foreign competition. His affinities for what he calls the mother country are so strong, and his dogmas acquired from school books, so fixed that he can not distinguish between the interests of a new, great and growing country and the ideal policy of his fancies and dreams. He neither did nor can throw any light upon the economic questions in which you are interested. He demonstrates this in his little speech between speeches in a manner so "childlike and bland" that it is worth quoting. He says that at a free trade meeting in England "he was irritated by the assumption of some of the speakers that it would be an excellent thing for England if the free trade doctrine should prevail in America," when he tells us he got up and says "that those persons in England who expect that the adoption of free trade here would be profitable to them were greatly mistaken." I can imagine the smiles of satisfaction of the great English merchants who have spent so much money to get a foothold in our home market, at this delusion of the American Minister.

I wish to speak of this distinguished citizen of Boston with sincere respect, but would apply to him the memorable language used by Whittier, the great poet of Massachusetts, who still lives among you, honored and beloved by all, of Daniel Webster, the great statesman of Massachusetts, who, in a critical moment disappointed his friends and constituents:

> Revile him not—the tempter hath
> A snare for all:
> And pitying tears, not scorn and wrath,
> Befit his fall.

And now I call your attention to the remarks made by a fellow Senator, with whom I do not agree in politics, yet for whom I have a sincere respect. Senator Morgan does refer to the world's trade, and laments that the framers of the Constitution prohibited an export tax on domestic productions. He says "no other government has found it wise or expedient thus to limit its sovereign power and thus deny to itself the power to take care of its people even in times of emergency." He says also that "we could have derived incalculable wealth by levying duties on the exportation of cotton, yellow pine and lumber." This is the key of his political opinions. He sincerely believes in the provision of the Confederate Constitution that no duty or tax on imports shall be laid to promote or foster any industry. Whatever you may think of a tax on exports, so common among nations in the dark ages and now repudiated by nearly every civilized government in the world, you can not question his sincerity or honesty. But it does seem to me that it is scarcely necessary, before a Boston audience, to discuss the wisdom of the policy of the framers of the Constitution in prohibiting all duties on exports and allowing, without limit or restraint, duties on imported goods. Senator Morgan, in his place in the Senate, expressed a doubt whether the vast development of the internal iron and coal resources of Alabama was a blessing to that State, because the labor demanded for it advanced the price of labor in the cotton field 25 cents a day.

Again, he said to the Tariff Reform League: "We exported during the last fiscal year agricultural productions worth more than $523,-036,923. If our agricultural productions should not be at all increased, we should need a population in this country of at least 150,-000,000 people to consume them."

This extraordinary statement is but a fair illustration of the argument of free-traders. According to this it requires only $523,000,000 agricultural productions to feed 100,000,000 of people for a year, or $5.23 a head. This may do in Alabama, but certainly would not do in Ohio or Massachusetts.

The truth is, our entire exportation of agricultural products is less than 7 per cent. of our domestic production, and the foreign market for such productions is a most uncertain, unstable, and variable market, depending entirely upon the accident of a good or a bad crop or a war in Europe, while the home market, consuming more than 93 per cent. of our agricultural productions, is steady, unchanging and permanent. The increase of our population for the past three years will consume more of our agricultural products than the aggregate exported. The workingmen of New England alone consume far more of the products of the Western farmers than all Europe. It is strange, indeed, that such delusions will mislead an intelligent American statesman.

Mr. Morgan says that "The farmers reject the threadbare falsehood that the bounties they pay for labor to other classes are to be restored to them in the benefits of this visionary home market." * * * "The only home market the existing tariff has built up has been for the manufacturers."

Gentlemen, our farmers in the West have got far beyond the reach of this appeal to prejudice, and it will not be long before the farmers of Alabama and the South generally, and even the cotton planters, will learn by experience that the hungry mouths of workingmen, engaged in varied pursuits in every part of our country, furnish the best market for their productions. And you in New England, even your professors and free-traders, will learn that the steady demand made by millions of your countrymen in the West and South for textile and metallic fabrics furnishes you a hundred fold better market than you can find with all your ingenuity and enterprise in the overstocked markets of Europe and Asia. If you join in breaking down this system in order to increase your foreign market for manufactures from 2 to 10 per cent., you will destroy the goose that lays the golden egg.

Now, let us drop our post-prandial friends of the league and consider what we mean by protection and one or two matters upon which we may differ.

The policy of protection is founded upon the idea that it is best for us as a nation to produce, by American labor, as many of the articles essential to human life and comfort as possible; that to encourage their production we are justified in levying upon foreign articles that come into competition with ours, such reasonable rates of duty as will induce capital to embark in such industries, and secure to American workingmen reasonable wages consistent with the higher wants and the better food, clothing, and shelter demanded by American workingmen. The object of all this is to secure the greatest diversity of employments by the substitution of American products for foreign products. When this policy was first adopted there were practically no manufactures in America, and the principal object was to develop the simpler and ruder forms of manufacture and the raw materials of industry. Now our manufactures have grown to such a marvelous degree that they amounted in 1880, according to the census, to $5,400,000,000, and according to an estimate made three years ago to over $6,000,000,000, and now to nearly $7,-000,000,000.

The question has arisen whether the policy of protection should extend to raw materials produced on the farm and from the mine, or whether these should be admitted free of duty.

We all agree that all crude articles necessary for manufacture that can not with reasonable labor be produced in this country ought to be admitted duty free. More than $100,000,000 in value of such articles are now admitted duty free; but the crude materials for manufacture raised on our farms or in our mines, which come into competition with foreign labor, have been considered just objects of protection.

Now it is proposed to place these upon the free list and continue the protection to manufactures. The principal articles of this kind are wool produced by the farmer, iron ore by the miner, and pig iron by the furnace.

Now, if this question is to be determined as a mere matter of local interest, according to Gen. Hancock, or, as Mr. Lowell suggests, "with aces in the sleeves," the men of Boston might selfishly say that, as they want wool and make the woolens, they will vote for no duty on wool, because they can buy wool cheaper in South America and Australia; and they might say they will vote for no duty on iron ore because they can import it cheaper from England and Wales. But such a decision would be an abandonment of the whole principle of protection. The benefits of this policy must be reciprocal and the system upon which it is founded must be universal. The American farmer produces wool with the same competition that the manufacturer produces woolens, and should have the same consideration and protection in his employment that is freely conceded to the manufacturer, no more no less. His product is the completed article of his labor. And so with the mining and smelting of ores, the rich resources planted by Providence in every part of our country. The labor bestowed in their development is as much entitled to the friendly aid of the Government as the finest fabric of the loom, or the completed work of mechanical skill. When you remember that more than a million farmers are engaged in raising wool, and produce 282,000,000 pounds, and hundreds of thousands of laboring men are required to mine more than ten million tons of iron ore, from Alabama to the borders of Lake Superior and from Lake Champlain to the Pacific Ocean, you must see that to leave these industries unprotected against the competition of the lowest paid and most degraded labor of Europe and Africa would be indefensible, and expose the whole system to overthrow. All that the farmer or the miner asks is that reasonable and proper protection which is cheerfully extended to all branches of manufacturing coming into competition with foreign industry; that their labor and employments receive the same consideration in framing your tariff laws given to other industries. They only ask enough duty to compensate for the difference in the price of labor here and the country with which they compete. Nor do they ask duties on grades of wool they can not produce. I confess that in reasoning about this matter I can not help expressing my profound contempt for the selfishness of the policy declared by Mr. Mayor Hewitt in a letter to the league, in which, while demanding increased duties for the articles that he is producing, he insists on the repeal of duties on materials he uses.

Now, gentlemen, you may ask me what I have to say about tariff reform. I answer that I am decidedly in favor of tariff reform, always have been and always will be. I have participated in tariff reform since 1856; but my idea of tariff reform is not especially to make our duties acceptable to foreign nations, but rather to promote the interests of our own people; not to take lessons from the Cobden Club or the English aristocracy, but from Washington, Jefferson, Jackson and Lincoln, and to follow the teachings of Webster and Clay. I am not in favor of that kind of tariff reform which brings Senator Morgan and Mr. Lowell together. I do not know what they mean by tariff reform. I suppose it is eighty-two per cent. on sugar and twenty per cent. on woolens; the highest rate possible on what they produce, and the lowest rate, or none at all, on what other people produce. I am afraid if these two eminent representatives of tariff reform would exchange ideas on other topics they would not be so harmonious. If Mr. Lowell should discuss civil service reform, Mr. Morgan would pronounce it a humbug, and yet they agree on the tariff reform recommended by Mr. Cleveland, which is a general reduction of the duties on foreign importations, and especially on raw materials.

Now, to this I am opposed; first, because it is an injustice to American citizens in every part of our country who have been invited to engage in the process of manufacture, and a still greater injustice to the millions of laboring people who depend upon our industries thus protected. Again, the policy proposed will not reduce the revenue, but will absolutely increase it, and thus swell the surplus as well as disturb the business of the country. It will necessarily check the enormous productions of the country, increase and harden the competition now existing between European and American labor, and reduce the wages of all laboring men employed in protected industries. It will, in my judgment, disturb or break down large departments of industry now in the course of successful experiment. It is a departure from the policy recommended by our fathers, and especially the policy adopted within the last twenty-five years, under which our manufactures have grown to their present enormous aggregate. It is a departure from the policy adopted by the most intelligent nations of Europe and America, especially our kinsmen in Canada, who followed our example and have been benefited by it.

But, you may ask me, how I would reduce the surplus revenue. I answer frankly that the tariff ought to be carefully revised with a view to correct any inequalities or incongruities that have grown out of the change of values since the passage of the act in 1883; that every imported article which does not compete with our domestic industry and is essential to the comfort and wants of our people should be placed upon the free list; that every raw material of industry which does not compete with our own production should be specially selected for the free list; that wherever any industry which can be conducted in this country with reasonable success needs a moderate increase of duty for its protection, to give it, and in this way check foreign importations and lessen the revenue. The direct taxes upon American productions levied by our internal revenue laws, which interfere with the industry of our people, should be modified or repealed; that in this way the revenues of the Government should be reduced so as to supply only enough revenue to pay the expenses of the government wisely and economically administered, and to carry out the provisions of the sinking fund for the gradual reduction of the public debt. In estimating the expenditures of the Government I would provide for proper appropriations for the improvement of the harbors, for the defense of our sea coasts, for the increase of our mercantile marine, for transporting our mails to foreign countries, and a liberal provision for all the obligations we are under to the Union soldiers, their widows and their orphans, by whose courage alone we have a country to care for, a flag to honor, and a government to protect us. Above all, I would impartially protect our home market from the deluge of foreign importations, and encourage, maintain, diversify, and establish on a sure foundation the industries of our people in all parts of our country.

When they tell us that with free trade or lower duties we could buy some things cheaper abroad, I answer that, even if this be true, we can afford to pay such prices as will insure home production and fair wages, and we can point them to an unbroken experience that home competition reduces the price more and more, while American workshops give us a home market whose benefits extend to every industrial pursuit in our broad land. By this home competition we will in due time order the markets of the world, as we have already in many branches of manufacture. With wise statesmanship we could now, but for the narrow ideas of the powers that be, establish such commercial relations with the Dominion of Canada, with Mexico, and the South American States as would enable us to extend our markets and our friendly assistance in developing the untold resources of two continents. In this great American policy we naturally look to Boston to take the lead, and when she leads a nation of 60,000,000 of people will follow.

One of the greatest drawbacks to beginners in poultry-raising is to attempt to keep fifty fowls in a house or lot none too large for twenty-five. Poultry yards should be on sandy soil, if possible, in order to avoid mud or slush on the ground, as roup is liable to break out in flocks that are kept in damp locations. The yards should be well drained the surface covered with sharp, fine gravel, and cleaned off at least once every two weeks, where the flock is large.

There is no longer any question about the removal of Libby prison to Chicago. The final transaction in the deal was completed last Friday, and the building is now the property of a local syndicate, whose purpose is to transplant it in Chicago by June 1st. Advices from Washington indicate that hundreds of meritorious bills will die upon the calendars of the House at the close of the session that might have been passed had the Democratic members been on hand to attend to business. The Republicans are generally in their seats or provided with pairs, and in order to do any work the Democrats have to demand the yeas and nays, and go over the long list of names twice in order to bring in the absentees. They have clearly demonstrated their lack of discipline and want of leadership by being outgeneraled by the Republican minority. The quality of campaign buncombe brought forth will hardly satisfy the country that it has received full value.

James D. Leary, the builder of the big raft which was lost at sea in Dec. last, returned recently from Port Joggins, N. S., where he has a timber ship in course of construction on the ways on which the raft was built. It is to be about 650 feet long, 100 feet longer than the raft. It will be built in the same general way as the raft, only the ends will be sharper, and will be bulkheaded to resist the action of the waves. This raft will be ship-rigged, with six large masts and will need no tugs. A large gang of men has been at work for several weeks under the supervision of H. R. Robertson, who built the raft, hauling the huge timbers which are being chained into one giant bundle. The timbers are by far the largest that have ever been shipped from Nova Scotia. The work is about half completed and the monster will be ready to launch sometime in July or August. The cost of the construction will be nearly half as much again as that of the raft.

In arguing the Bell telephone case before the Commissioner of Patents the other day, Robert G. Ingersoll, one of the counsel, closed his argument with the following permanent remarks, which it will be well for all inventors to remember. The conclusions are sound and as applicable in other cases as the one on which the learned counsel made the application: "I do not believe any man can patent the idea of sending speech by electricity. He can patent devices by which that can be done, but he cannot get a patent on the lightning. A man can patent a water wheel but he cannot patent the water, or say to the water you cannot turn any wheel but mine. A man can patent a windmill, but not wind, and any man who can make a better mill may use the same wind, because we do not get our entire stock of wind from the patent office or from the attorneys on the other side. Wind is the free gift of all politicians, and looking at the attorneys of the Bell people, without wind where would your case be?"

The postoffice at Traverse City was turned over to Postmaster Sprague, the new appointee, Monday. M. E. Haskell, the retiring p. m., commenced with the postoffice 14 years ago and worked his way up from the position of general delivery clerk.

Traverse City young ladies have organized a broom brigade and will shortly give a public drill. The proceeds derived from their expert handling of the weapons will be given to charity and the experience will be saved up for their future husbands.

The Bois Blanc land company, consisting of Cheboygan and Jackson citizens, have 800 acres on the shores of Bois Blanc Island, and are building a dock, at which the largest boats can land. They hope to make the island the finest cottage resort in the state, and have platted 200 lots.

Petoskey Record: Letters received from Mr. James Buckley indicate that he is not favorably impressed with Decatur, Chattanooga, and other points in that region, but thinks a good deal of Louisville, Ky. It is expected that he will reach Petoskey some time this week.

In the light of latter improvements it was undoubtedly the refusal of the department to establish steamboat mail service to Manistique that the Washington dispatch mentioned last week referred to. We are glad that the winter service of the Islanders is not to be disturbed, but will remain as at present.

Cheboygan Tribune: Chas. Louisignaw, keeper of the Cheboygan light house, tells the Cheboygan Tribune that from the light house he can see open water a few miles below the point in Lake Huron. Last year at this time he says there was no water in sight.——Chas. H. Nuite, who has a logging camp operating on Bois Blanc Island, says that in mid straits between Cheboygan and the island the ice is only about one foot thick.

Petoskey Independent: Constable and Sons are preparing 30 miles of new nets for fishing operations next season.——U. S. Commissioner Cull rendered his decision Monday in the trespass case of J. K. Feick, the prisoner being held for trial in the U. S. District Court at Grand Rapids.——C. W. Ingalls has purchased some fine blooded stock for his farms and says he is going to buy a lot of sheep next summer, even if the tariff is all sheared off from wool.

A report from Garfield Township Kalkaska county, says James Patrick, a farmer, in whose family lived an adopted son, Bert Todd, who had been indentured to him from the state public school at Coldwater, has been guilty of flogging the boy most unmercifully. The boy is said to have fled, and when he was found by a neighbor the little fellow's feet were badly frozen. It is said the farmer used the buckle end of a strap, and with it cut the boy badly. Patrick has been arrested.

The Edison Electric Light Co., of the "Soo," is going to erect two towers 225 feet high in order to get their wires across the canal so as not to interfere with navigation. The tower north of the canal is to be made a look-out station, having a platform on top sixteen feet square, protected by a strong railing on all sides. An elevator, operated by electricity, is to be put in to convey parties desiring to survey the booming burg and surroundings, from terra firma to the top of the tower.

Up near Reed City there lives a man named Smith, who is of African decent, and who before the war was a slave in the south. He has a small farm which he calls his own, and from which he makes his living, and a few weeks ago he sent his old master in the south a box of provisions, and now he has sent him money with which to come to Reed City, when he comes he is to go to work for his former slave if he wishes to. Smith says: "Times have changed. The ole marster use to make me work for him; now he is gwine to work for me."

St. Ignace Watchman: And now the prohibitionists are going to try and carry local option in Cheboygan county. Up at the Soo the "drys" have compromised with the "wets," the latter binding themselves to live faithfully up to the new liquor law.——Emmet county has gone "dry" and the tourist, next summer will have to get along with the pure Lake Michigan water. The result of the election is worth thousands of dollars to Mackinaw Island.——The Cheboygan Tribune says that men had to come over from Cheboygan to build our docks for us. The men themselves, though, say they came over here because they couldn't get work enough in Cheboygan to keep them from starving to death.

East Jordan Enterprise: It is reported that the hoop factory will start up April 24. The proprietors report a larger supply of logs, and of a better quality than last year.——The Central hotel will be opened in a few weeks, with a first-class hotel man as manager.——The Rev. John R. Robinson, the Indian preacher, will assist the pastor in the protracted meetings now in progress at the M. E. Church.——Mr. and Mrs. Cash, of Eveline, who are well and favorably known in this town, expect to go to San Jose, Cal., in a few weeks, to remain an indefinite period.——William Harris, of Norwood, secretary of the Board of School Examiners, is winning gold opinions among the teachers for his fairness, and among those who are interested in educational matters he is commended for his earnestness and vigorous enthusiasm in the work.

The current number of the Northwestern Lumberman shows that the value of our hardwoods are at least recognized in Chicago. It says: "A wholesale pine dealer of this city, who, like many others, is investing his surplus profits in timber lands, has got a notion that he prefers to deal in Northern Michigan hardwood lands rather than any other. He says that investors may go South for yellow pine, cypress and poplar, if they want to, but as for him he prefers the bracing, healthy air of the North, and a land of certain and continuous progress. He is purchasing hardwood lands in Charlevoix and Emmet counties, and holdings also in the Northern Peninsula. His argument is that he can make money in clearing the land of the timber, and when the denuding process should be completed, he will have landed property worth more than it was when covered with woods. Lands purchasable now at $5 and $6 an acre will be worth from $15 to $20 when cleared, and $25 to $30 in peculiarly favorable locations. There is no locality in Northern Michigan but is, or soon will be, in ready communication with the better markets East and West, not only by means of the great lakes, but by railroad."

Very Remarkable Recovery.

Mr. Geo. V. Willing, of Manchester, Mich., writes: "My wife has been almost helpless for five years, so helpless that she could not turn over in bed alone. She used two Bottles of Electric Bitters, and is so much improved that she is able now to do her own work."

Electric Bitters will do all that is claimed for them. Hundreds of testimonials attest their great curative powers. Only fifty cents a bottle at Dr. G. W. Crouter's.

Excitement in Texas.

Great excitement has been caused in the vicinity of Paris, Tex., by the remarkable recovery of Mr. J. E. Finding relief, he bought a large bottle and a box of Dr. King's New Life Pills; by the time he had taken two boxes of Pills and two bottles of the Discovery, he was well and had gained in flesh thirty-six pounds. Jones and Johnson.

In Providence [illegible] Jones and Johnson. Jones is a rather [illegible] member of a congregation presided over by a new pastor, who, soon after his installation, started out with a subscription paper in a worthy cause. He met Johnson on the street. "Oh, my dear Mr. Jones," said he, "I have been told that you are interested in this cause. I hope that you will give freely." "Certainly," said Johnson, who was quick witted. "Put me down for $100." Days passed and Jones didn't send the money, so the parson called at his office, and said that he'd be glad to have the money. "What money?" asked Jones. "Why, the $100 that you subscribed." Jones couldn't remember any such subscription, but he did remember that about that time he was on a quiet and very private spree. Could he have met the pastor then and subscribed? Possibly, and so, rather than confess his weakness to his pastor, he paid the $100. Johnson soon told of his share in the joke, but he refuses to accept Jones' suggestion and pay him $50.

His Sister.

We read about the prodigal son, and and the prodigal son's father and brother, but no mention is made of the prodigal son's sister. Of course he had a sister; most prodigal sons have.

And sometimes they entertained a great affection for the wild, wayward boy, which no amount of reckless conduct can wholly estrange.

And the respect and love in which the prodigal holds that sister is often the one redeeming trait in his character. He angrily resents the mention of her name among ribald and profligate companions, should such a thing occur, and he would as soon think of presenting the evil one to her as one of them.

Instead of angrily upbraiding him for his irregularities, as his father does, or scornfully alluding to them in the manner peculiar to a moral and highly-respected brother, she remonstrates with him gently, and endeavors to win him back to virtue's ways through the tender influence of a sister's love. He may not seem to heed her at the time, but perhaps good seed is sown that may sprout beneficially in after years.

Who knows how much his recollections of a sister at home, good and pure, may have aided in bringing the prodigal back to his father's house, meek and repentant. True, there is no record of her having rushed out to meet and embrace him, but perhaps she was married and living in another part of the country. Had she been at home her sisterly instinct would have been the first to recognize him in his tramp's disguise, and she would have outdone even her father's greeting.—Texas Siftings.

YELLOW-HAND'S SCALP.

How It Came to [illegible] at [illegible]

[illegible] Buffalo Bill's life was the killing of Yellow-Hand, a famous Cheyenne Chief, and the consequent naming of War Bonnet Creek in Wyoming from that circumstance. When Gen. Crook was scouting [illegible] Buffalo Bill was his wagon master and chief of scouts. A courier had come into Crook's camp with the intelligence that young Sitting Bull had broken away from Red Cloud Agency with 800 fighting braves and were then on the way to join old Sitting Bull up there in Montana Territory, while Yellow-Hand, the big Chief of the Cheyennes, had also left his agency without permission, with 600 warriors, bound north on a [illegible]. Troops were out scouring the country in every direction. Crook's particular purpose being to reach Running Water, follow on to Rawhide Creek, cross a plateau to Indian Creek, and there meet and crush Yellow-Hand or drive him back to the agency.

Arriving on the plateau mentioned [illegible] of Indians could be seen [illegible] in the dim distance, and [illegible] of the [illegible] predicted that every [illegible] in the civilized command would be killed. There were five companies of infantry and one troop of cavalry, the latter making a detour and coming around ahead of the wagon train in line of battle, while the mule whackers were ordered to dismount and fight by their mules. All this took time. At last the red men drew quite near, when from their lines rode out in front of the lines, halting midway, a magnificently equipped and gaudily decorated Indian, his handsome war bonnet lined with eagles feathers trailing behind, and a shining Winchester rifle resting on the angle of his arm. He proudly sat his steed and surveyed the pale-faces with [illegible] and scorn. Then, uttering a war whoop of defiance, the chieftain raised his rifle fired one shot at his enemies. The challenger was Yellow-Hand. His riding forth alone, delivering but a single shot, and that in the face of his enemies, the uttering of a defiant war whoop—all this meant nothing more or less than a challenge to a duel. Was there no one among all those white soldiers to take up the gauntlet so defiantly thrust at them?

For a moment everything was still; not a sound was heard, the Indian meanwhile sitting majestically before them and awaiting the result of his shot. Then all at once from the white men's lines dashed a single horseman with his rifle carried at a ready, who rode obliquely along the front of the line, then turning suddenly toward the champion standing alone and ready to receive him. Troops and Indians watched with interest the outcome of the fight, for it meant a duel to the death. Yellow-Hand started his pony galloping in a circle, lying far on the opposite side according to aboriginal style of fighting from horseback, and fired [illegible] shot quickly and rapidly at his [illegible] adversary. Buffalo Bill sat on his steed like a Centaur and only pulled the trigger when there was some reason for it, preferring not to waste a shot unless there was some chance of hitting. Gradually the circle became smaller, and the faster Yellow-Hand fired his Winchester, always loading his magazine and manipulating his piece while lying alongside his flying animal. When the distance had been lessened to about fifty yards and when Buffalo Bill had been grazed more than once by his enemy's lead, the latter suddenly halted his horse, took a quick and accurate aim at the circling pair, and pulled the trigger. Down went the rider and steed, rolling over in the dust, both of them shot to the death. Rushing forward, the white scout leaped from his horse, and, whipping out a long keen hunting knife, scalped the great warrior in full sight of both armies.

With the loss of their leader the spirit of the Indians was broken. They could not fight after that calamity, the scalping of their favorite chief utterly and teetotally breaking their savage hearts. They gave up the scheme of joining the other hostiles in Montana and hurried back to their own agency, scattering provisions and plunder by the way. That night the troops camped in Indian Creek, and in honor of Buffalo Bill's great achievement and handsome trophy taken from Yellow-Hand's head, the name was changed from Indian Creek to War Bonnet Creek, which latter title it still bears.—Cleveland Leader.

A Big Eater.

He was courting a Mission girl, and had been invited to dine with the family on Sunday, says the San Francisco Post. He noticed that his adored one did not eat much, and remarked to her that her appetite was light.

"Oh yes, Mr. Yardeash," replied the fair one; "I am not a large eater. Ma says I cost less to keep than any of her children."

"You'd otter seen her stuffin' down pie and cheese afore dinner," said her young brother. "She's giving you guff."

The lady of the house arose in her place, and, looking the young man full in the eye, said, firmly: "Mr. Yardeash, my daughter told you the truth. She is not a large eater. Her brother John Henry has been reading the funny papers, and thought he would leave a joke on us. His father will have the kindness to attend to him up-stairs. My son must not grow up to be a liar."

"Why, ma," ejaculated John Henry, "didn't I hear you tell Tillie to eat a good lunch and not give her appetite away before her young man?"

"No, my son, you did not —"

Five seconds later boyish screams were heard from an upper room.

"Ma," said Tillie, suddenly, "it's a shame to whip that boy. He told the truth, and I won't see him whipped for all the dry goods clerks on Kearney street. I won't," and she flounced from the room, while Mr. Yardeash remarked to her mother: "It's bad policy for a mother to meddle with her daughter's affairs. If you think I want a slim-waisted, consumptive-faced wife, you are away off. Let her eat."

In Portland, Maine, lives a man who has a false nose, a glass eye, but three fingers and one thumb, one ear, false teeth, false hair, and a cork leg, yet he is the liveliest man in Portland. He walks ten miles every day, rain or shine. He has had three wives, and survives them all, and has refused [illegible] chances to get married again, so he says, since he buried his wife, about a year ago.

Circumstantial Evidence.

"[illegible] circumstantial evidence," said [illegible] teacher, "differs from ocular proof [illegible] in the latter case the evidence is seen by the witness, while in the former case circumstances lead to a [illegible] without actually demonstrating it. [illegible] illustrate, I have a boil on the back of my neck. I cannot see the boil, but circumstances convince me that it is there. Now, children, do you see the point?" "Yes, sir." "Well, then, what is circumstantial evidence?" "A boil on the back of your neck" roared the class in chorus.—Norman Independent.

Lively Fish.

There was a certain character in one of our country towns who was noted more for the various means to which he resorted to earn a living than for his veracity. At one time it happened he was peddling fish, and his cry summoned a very particular old lady to the side of the wagon. "Are these fish fresh?" she asked, viewing the finny representatives with suspicion. "Yes'm; caught this very morning," was the reply. "Are you sure?" she continued, giving the load another poke. "They all seem to be dead." "Dead?" echoed the vendor. "Dead? Yes'm, they are dead. They were so lively when I left home that I had to kill 'em to keep 'em from jumpin' out of their wagon."—Harper's Bazar.

Henry Watterson's Benediction.

From the initial number of the Louisville Sunday News. I do not, young men, know how, after giving you a hearty "God speed" in your enterprise, I can comply with your urgency to say something appropriate to the occasion. Once upon a time I worked for a man, and one of the best men I ever knew, big of brain and heart, who was just and kind to me, but who never quite forgave me for quitting his service and going out into the world to seek its favors on my own hook. Since then I have had many quit me for that purpose, and can truly say that no one of them ever went away without carrying with him my sympathy. It is a hard thing, and it affords but poor prospect for energetic and aspiring youthhood to work for a task-master on a salary, and I am always gratified to see the "boys branch out," as you are doing. Each of you earned the right to your independence by the work you did on the Courier-Journal. Keep it up, and you can not fail to achieve success in your new field of labor. Make the Sunday News a transcription of yourselves, self-respecting and sincere; equally upright and elevated; at all times and in all places, a "gentleman."

"With malice toward none and charity for all," firm but courteous, and through the most serious trials of public duty maintaining a healthy, cheery, sensible good humor. Your wish to have your professional associates on board, as it were, when you launch you bark, is of most excellent augury. It indicates that you are inspired by an honorable esprit de corps. I never knew a man that was false to that who did not fail. It is an ill bird that fouls his own nest; and are we not all of us birds of a feather? Believe me, it is a greater pleasure to me to have your desire for this recognition than it can be to you to receive it; and so, God bless you and good luck to you!

The Departed Chimney-Sweeps.

The following interview with one of Boston's old-time chimney-sweeps will be of interest to our young folks at this time:

"How long is it since the practice of sending boys up the chimneys was discontinued in this city?" asked the reporter.

"Oh, over thirty years, I guess. The last boy I had was James H. Johnson. I got him from New York. He lives in Richmond street. He can tell you more about that kind of chimney-sweeping than anybody else in Boston."

The reporter was fortunate in finding Mr. Johnson at home. Mr. Johnson is a well-preserved man, verging on to sixty years of age. On learning the object of the reporter's visit, he announced his willingness to furnish all the information in his power.

"Yes, sir," said Mr. Johnson, "I was the last boy who climbed a chimney in Boston, and that was thirty-six years ago, and the chimney was the kitchen chimney of the Tremont House. It was early in the morning. The cook told me he had only half an hour to start a fire and get breakfast. I started up that chimney with the scraper in one hand and the brush in the other, taking two sides of the flue at once. The cook started up-stairs just as I started up the flue, and when he reached the roof I put out my head and sung a line or two from the old song, 'Dandy Jim from Carolina.' We had to sing a verse after reaching the top of a chimney to let folks know we was up."

By the way, Mr. Johnson's statement about the singing explains one of the stanzas found in Mr. Scarlet's advertising poem:

On top of chimney hear the song so clear,
Wh[illegible] aloft in airy seat
Counting "Sweet Home," sung out like [illegible]
From [illegible] to glory bursting out so sweet.

"I started down the flue," continued Mr. Johnson, "taking the other two sides, and was at the bottom as quick as the cook. He was so pleased with my expedition that he gave me a splendid breakfast and some money for myself besides. I never went up a chimney after. Scarlet was paying me $1.25 a week and I wanted $1.50. He said he could not pay it, so I left."

"Where did you learn the business?"

"In Philadelphia. I began by going up and down the chimney of my mother's house. Then I was put out as an apprentice to a master. The principal chimney-sweeper in Philadelphia then was Nancy Jerus, a colored woman. She had quite a number of boys and she had a lot of business. She was a strict Methodist and wouldn't allow her boys to sing anything but hymns when they reached the top of the chimney. In those days it was no uncommon thing to see early in the morning a black head stuck out of a chimney-pot and hear a voice coming from it, singing:

Return, sinner, to return!
Stay out for the morrow's sun,
Lest the lamp should fail to burn,
Ere Salvation's work is done.

"I used to sing mostly 'Old Dan Tucker' and 'Dandy Jim from Carolina.' The first chimney I ever swept for money was in Villa street, Philadelphia. I gave it such a thorough cleaning that the lady gave me an 11 penny bit extra for the work."

"Were you ever stuck in a chimney?"

"No. I knew too much for that. I found out that I could go anywhere where my shoulders would go through, and where I couldn't get my shoulders easily into a flue I wouldn't enter it"—Boston Republic.

TRAIN ROBBERS AT WORK.

Three Men Hold Up an Express Train at Kingsland, Ark.

A TRAIN on the St. Louis, Arkansas and Texas Railroad was looted by three bold highwaymen at Kingsland, Ark., on Thursday last. Bob Law, the engineer of the train, describes the robbery as follows:

"I had just put on the air brakes for Kingsland when a fellow came crawling over the tender toward me, and in an instant had his revolver pressing against the side of my head. He said, 'Pull out quick,' and I did it, you bet. After we had run about a mile and a half he told me to shut her off, and as soon as we stopped two other fellows showed up from behind the tender and ordered me and my fireman to 'Come off that.' Hackett, my fireman, crawled down, but I told them that I wouldn't leave my machine. In about a second there were six revolvers pointed at me, and I concluded it was too warm in my engine anyway, so I got down, too. Then they told us to uncouple the mail and express car from the rest of the train, but we pretended not to be able to do it, and as Messenger Tom Calvin refused to open up they commenced shooting in lively shape. Then they got a can of oil from the engine and a wad waste, piled it against the car door, and set fire to it. Calvin began to beg them, and told them if they would agree not to hurt him he would open up. They told him to come ahead and he threw open the door and jumped down to the ground. The robbers then helped themselves. I don't believe they got a great deal, as about nine-tenths of the money was hidden by the messenger. It was the easiest thing done I ever saw. We stood there for about forty minutes and not a single man showed up out of the cars except a nigger who stood on the platform and cursed the robbers …"

BURIED BY AN AVALANCHE

GOING HOME TO DIE.

… Vallejo, Cal., and it is now believed that fully forty lives were lost. Says a San Francisco telegram:

The steamer was about to leave her moorings and had about seventy persons on board, many of whom were going across the strait to work in the lumber yards … Just as the deck hands were hauling in the lines there was a loud explosion … a sheet of flame shot into the air … were on deck at the time were blown overboard by the force of the explosion, and several of them were killed outright by being struck by pieces of debris, which were sent flying in all directions. In a few minutes all was confusion, for the men, women, and children, who had relatives on board the ill-fated Julia, were wailing and wringing their hands as they rushed around the wharf. The men on the wharf were anxious to aid, but there seemed to be but little for them to do, as most of the passengers were below decks at the time of the explosion, and were either killed outright or were drowned when the water poured in upon them. To add to the terror of the scene, large … of petroleum stored on the wharf for replenishing the steamer's tanks caught fire, and fifteen minutes after the explosion about 600 feet of wharf, the freight depot, and the telegraph office were burning. While the firemen and others were trying to save the wharf a large number of boatmen were rowing around the wreck seeking to recover the bodies. While the search was going on women and children were standing back from the burning wharf, and as each body was brought to the surface and placed in a shed the crowd would gather around, and piercing exclamations soon told that some relative of the dead had recognized the mangled remains. Soon after the explosion occurred the steamer had burned to the water's edge and sunk to the bottom with the greater number of victims buried under the debris in the cabin. It is believed that between thirty and forty lives were lost.

JUSTICE HARLAN, at Indianapolis, on Tuesday last, rendered his decision in the case of Coy and Bernhamer, convicted in the Federal District Court of conspiracy to induce election officers to surrender their papers. The application for a writ of error was overruled, and a new trial refused.

A CHICAGO telegram gives the following particulars of a horrible murder in that city:

A shocking tragedy took place in the dingy two-story frame building at No. … State street. When pretty … old Maggie Gaughan went to work early in the morning she was admitted to the shop by the negro foreman, a young … named Zeph Davis. There was no one else in the place at the time. The brute seized the opportunity, and dragging her to the rear of the building attempted to assault her. She resisted and he dragged her into a little closet under the stairway, and choking her to the floor in the corner completed his hellish work. She still struggled, and the fiend seized a small hatchet and chopped her about the face and head. Gripping one hand around her throat, he hacked away at the writhing and dying girl. After crushing her skull …

BLAINE REITERATES.

In an Interview He Again Declares Positively that He Is Not a Candidate.

Belief Expressed by Him that He Is Out of the Presidential Canvass.

The New York World prints a three-column interview with Mr. Blaine which has been cabled from Florence by Mr. T. C. Crawford:

Mr. Blaine, in the course of a long conversation, distinctly asserted that under no circumstances whatever would he allow his name to be used in connection with the next Presidential nomination. He insists on the sincerity of his withdrawal, and asserts that he had made up his mind thereto long ago. He considers, first, that any man whose name has been associated with a defeat in a Presidential campaign owes it to his party not to allow himself to be renominated, and, secondly, he is unequal to facing the fatigues, worry and excitement of another canvass, all the more as he would feel himself bound to work as hard as on previous occasions. Mrs. Blaine and the other members of his family are most emphatic in their approval of his withdrawal, which is definitive, and neither hasty nor recent in its decision. Mr. Blaine will not return from Europe until June, and not until after the Republican convention. He declines to express himself on the subject of the Republican candidates in the field, but asserts that he did not retire in favor of any particular one of them. He is convinced of a Republican victory, basing his conviction in particular on the tariff question.

When Mr. Blaine was asked the direct question whether he would under any circumstances permit his name to be used again as a candidate, he replied in the most emphatic negative, but then added: "I do not wish to make any new declarations upon the subject. I have said all that I wish to say upon this subject in that letter. That letter, as you must know, was not a haphazard, off-hand affair. It was the result of much deliberation and careful thought. You will remember that I told you in Paris last December that I had no intention of being a candidate again, and that I had practically made up my mind at that time to forbid the use of my name in the approaching convention.

"I hold," he said later in the conversation, "that I have no right to be a candidate again. A man who has once been the candidate of his party and defeated owes it to his party to withdraw …"

MARKET REPORTS.

BASE-BALL.

What Is Being Done by Club Managers Preparatory to Opening the Season of 1888.

The League Clubs a Little Backward in the Matter of Organization.

[CHICAGO CORRESPONDENCE.]

March is here at last, and with the month of March will come the final preparations for the championship season of 1888. The first week in March the League schedule meeting will be held at New York, while the Association will meet in Brooklyn to arrange its championship dates; and between the first and twentieth days of the month all the other leagues in the country will make their schedules.

Reports from the different league centers find the League clubs just a bit backward on the matter of organization for the coming season. With the single exception of Chicago not one of the League teams is complete, and there will of necessity be some pretty lively hustling during the next few days, when the boys will have to make up their minds to "play or pay."

Chicago may possibly make a change in its infield this season. Anson for a season or two past has contemplated drawing out of active work, so that he may confine his duties to those of trainer and manager. It is not improbable that big Ed Williamson may be found at first base during a large number of next season's championship games, while either Duffy or Jimmy Ryan will take the big fellow's place at short. Anson says it is not safe for any man to bet upon the manner in which the team will be made up this season. He has, he thinks, the pick of base-ball material in the country to select from, and he himself does not know which of his men may prove themselves best adapted to the different fielding positions. One thing, however, can be depended upon, and that is that only the most capable men will make up the regular team.

Next to Chicago the Pittsburg team is nearest completion. …

BOTH SIDES RESOLUTE.

No Compromise Between the Burlington and Its Striking Employes.

Complete Suspension of Traffic—Violence by Strikers in Nebraska.

In Illinois.

[Chicago special.]

No arrangement tending to a settlement of difficulties has been made by the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad and its striking engineers and firemen. Both sides are confident of victory, and each adopts a tone of defiance towards the other. The Chicago, Burlington and Quincy officials expressed satisfaction with the status of affairs as existing. They claim to be fully competent to handle their suburban passenger traffic, and think from the way new men were coming in that in a week or ten days the whole system will be working with its old-time smoothness and precision. No through passenger trains were moving, and but few suburban trains were going out or coming in. The Brotherhood shows no sign of yielding. Every member is drawing his pay the same as if he were at work. An old member of the order asserted that the Brotherhood could pay every striker his wages for a year without assessing its members a dollar.

"If the strike is still on then," he continued, "there isn't an engineer who has a job that won't respond to a call of $5 to $50. It's a war of capital. We have as much money to spend in this fight as the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Road. The company hasn't a lot of men to fight who are liable to weaken because they are hungry." The committees continued to hire as many of the competent men as they could get. Six hundred men are out of work in the Burlington freight houses and several thousand men are idle in the lumber district. …

NATIONAL LAW-MAKERS.

What Is Being Done by the National Legislature.

AMONG the bills passed by the Senate Feb. 23 were the following: To carry into effect the international convention for the protection of submarine cables; to enable California to take lands in lieu of the 16th and 36th sections, found to be mineral lands; to provide for an international marine conference for securing greater safety for life and property at sea, to extend the laws of the United States over certain unorganized territory south of Kansas, popularly known as "No Man's Land," it establishes the Cimarron land district. The Public Buildings Committee reported favorably bills for erection of public buildings at Cheyenne, Wyoming Territory, $80,000, and Sioux City, Iowa, $250,000. The House passed bills appropriating $… for a public building at Birmingham, Ala., $100,000 for another at Duluth, Minn., and $… for the improvement of the public building at Newark, New Jersey.

A LONG discussion took place in the Senate, on Feb. 24, over the point that the bill to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua does not contain the restrictions and safeguards inserted in bills of a similar character. Mr. Sherman hoped that the bill, which simply incorporated certain well known gentlemen who proposed to build one of the greatest improvements of modern times, should be passed without unnecessary delay. He would vote from the Treasury of the United States enough to commence the work, and to complete it, but that was so evidently against the general popular voice that the idea had of course to be abandoned. The House Elections Committee presented a report in the contested election case of McDuffie vs. Davidson of Alabama, favorable to the claims of Davidson, the sitting member. Mr. Lodge of Massachusetts presented a minority report in favor of McDuffie. Mr. Springer reported adversely from the Committee on Territories the bills for the admission of North and South Dakota as separate States, and Mr. Baker of New York presented minority reports on the same measure. The Senate bill increasing the pension for deafness was favorably reported to the House.

THE bill to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua passed the Senate on the 27th ult., by a vote of 38 to 15. All the Senators voting in the negative hail from the Southern States. The Senate considered at length the bill granting pensions to ex-soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor and to dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and …

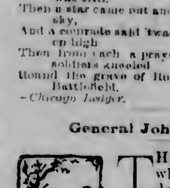
DURING the siege of …

General John Pulford.



THERE is no man …

"John Pulford," or "Honest John." Plain, rugged, lion-like in his shorn strength, he wears his wounds as badges of honor, and receives the adulation of his comrades with the simple loyalty of his nature. And those who know him best find in him the embodiment of Bayard Taylor's chevalier's lines:

"The bravest are the tenderest,
The loving are the daring."

General John Pulford was born in New York. He went to the war as First Lieutenant of the Fifth Michigan Volunteer Infantry. He was made Captain May 15, 1862. He was wounded and taken prisoner at Malvern Hill, Va., July 1, 1862. He was confined in Libby Prison for seventeen days, and exchanged on the 18th of July. He was appointed Major December 14, 1862. Wounded at Chancellorsville, Va. Wounded twice at Gettysburg, and again in the Wilderness. Made Colonel June 10, 1864. He was wounded at Boynton Plank Road, Va.; was breveted Brigadier General United States Volunteers March 13, 1865, "for good conduct and meritorious service during the war." The President's appointment reads, "for gallantry in action and efficiency in the line of duty." He was mustered out on the 5th of July, 1865,

"The girl cried all the way home to the Catholic institution where she lived, and you can believe it made me feel badly. When I returned I spoke to General Hartranft and mentioned what seemed to me the almost heartlessness of Mrs. Surratt. Then the General told me that the little girl had scarcely left the prison when Mrs. Surratt threw herself down in convulsions of such grief as he had never dreamed of before. It seems hard to imagine the struggle that woman must have undergone to control herself through that long interview. Afterward the intercourse between mother and daughter was almost entirely unrestrained. Their freedom was so great that I think now the administration would have been neither sorry nor surprised if the little girl had carried in enough morphine to have saved them the trouble of executing her mother.

"There are few people who know how nearly Mrs. Surratt came to a reprieve, followed by a commutation of sentence. There was a strong sentiment in her favor, and I think some doubt as to the degree of her guilt. I will never believe that she was privy to Lincoln's murder. She approved, I think, of his proposed abduction, but never of his assassination. We all thought she would be reprieved. Two days before the execution General Hancock came to me and said: 'Prepare at once to hang four. But,' he added, 'I think you'll only have to hang three.'

"I went to work at once to prepare the nooses. You know a hangman's knot has only seven turns in it. Well, I left Mrs. Surratt's noose to the last, and when I came to the fifth turn in her's I threw it aside, saying, 'Pshaw, what's the use of this? I won't have to use it.' …

GRANDMOTHER LOIS.

Dr. Talmage's Eighth Sermon to the Women of America.

This Is a Hard World for Women, and Also for Men—A Mother's Influence of Immense and Lasting Importance on Future Generations.

BROOKLYN, Feb. 26.—The Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D. D., preached in the Brooklyn Tabernacle to-day the eighth of his series of "Sermons to the Women of America, with important hints to men." His subject was: "The Grandmother and Her Children." A vast congregation was present. The opening hymn begins:

Give to the wind thy fears,
Hope and be undismayed;
God hears thy sighs and counts thy tears,
God shall lift up thy head.

Dr. Talmage's text was from II. Timothy i. 5: "The unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois."
The eloquent preacher said:

In this love letter which Paul, the old minister, is writing to Timothy, the young minister, the family record is brought out. Paul practically says: "Timothy, what a good grandmother you had. You ought to be better than most folks, because not only was your mother good but your grandmother. Two preceding generations of piety ought to give you a mighty push in the right direction." The fact was that Timothy needed encouragement. He was in poor health, having a weak stomach, and was dyspeptic, and Paul prescribed for him a tonic, "a little wine for thy stomach's sake"—not much wine, but a little wine, and only as a medicine. And if the wine then had been as much adulterated with logwood and strychnine as our modern wines, he would not have prescribed any.

But Timothy, not strong physically, is encouraged spiritually by the recital of grandmotherly excellence. Paul hinting to him, as I hint to you, that God sometimes gathers up as in a reservoir away back of the active generations of to-day a godly influence, and then, in response to prayer, …

… the world lasts so long. The world stood four thousand years before Christ came; it is not unreasonably to suppose that it may stand four thousand years after his arrival. Four thousand years the world swung off in sin; four thousand years it may be swinging back into righteousness. By the ordinary rate of multiplication of the world's population, in a century your descendants will be over six hundred, and by two centuries at least over a hundred thousand, perhaps two hundred thousand, and upon every one of them you, the mother of to-day will have an influence for good or evil. And if in two centuries your descendants shall have with their names filled a scroll of hundreds of thousands, will some angel from Heaven, to whom is given the capacity to calculate the number of the stars of Heaven and the sands of the seashore, step down and tell us how many descendants you will have in the four thousandth year of the world's possible continuance. Do not let the grandmothers any longer think that they are retired, and sit clear back out of sight from the world, feeling that they have no relation to it. The mothers of the last century are to-day in the Senates, Parliaments, the palaces, the pulpits, the banking houses, the professional chairs, the prisons, the almshouses, the company of midnight brigands, the cellars, the ditches of this century. You have been thinking about the importance of having the right influence upon one nursery. You have been thinking of the importance of getting those two little feet on the right path. You have been thinking of your child's destiny for the next eighty years, if it should pass on to be an octogenarian. That is well; but my subject sweeps a thousand years, a million years, a quadrillion of years. I cannot stop at one cradle, I am looking at the cradles that reach all round the world and across all time. I am not talking of Mother Eunice, I am talking of Grandmother Lois. The only way you can tell the force of a current is by sailing up stream; or the force of an ocean wave, by running the ship against it. Running along with it we cannot appreciate the force. …

… morning I want my congregation all about me. In Greenwood there is the resting-place of George W. Bethune, once a minister of Brooklyn Heights, his name never spoken among intelligent Americans without suggesting two things—eloquence and evangelism. In the same tomb sleeps his grandmother, Isabella Graham, who was the chief inspiration of his ministry. You are not surprised at the poetry and pathos and pulpit power of the grandson when you read of the faith and devotion of his wonderful ancestress. When you read this letter, in which she poured out her widowed soul in longings for a son's salvation, you will not wonder that succeeding generations have been blessed:

NEW YORK, May 20, 17… —This day my only son left me in bitter wringings of heart; he is again launched on the ocean, God's ocean. The Lord saved him from shipwreck, brought him to my home, and allowed me once more to indulge my affections over him. He has been with me but a short time, and ill have I improved it; he is gone from my sight and my heart bursts with tumultuous grief. Lord have mercy on the widow's son, "the only son of his mother."

I ask nothing in all this world for him; I repeat my petition, save his soul alive, give him salvation from sin. It is not the danger of the seas that distresses me; it is not the hardships he must undergo; it is not the dread of never seeing him more in this world; it is because I cannot discern the fulfillment of the promise in him. I cannot discern the new birth nor its fruit, but every symptom of captivity to Satan, the world and self will. This, this is what distresses me, and in connection with this his being shut out from ordinances at a distance from Christians; shut up with those who forget God, profane His name and break His Sabbaths; men who often live and die like beasts, yet are accountable creatures, who must answer for every moment of time and every word, thought, and action. Oh Lord, many wonders hast thou shown me, thy ways of dealing with me and mine have not been common ones; add this wonder to the rest. Call, convert, regenerate, and establish a sailor in the faith. Lord, all things are possible with thee; glorify thy son and extend His kingdom by sea and land; take the prey from the strong. I roll him over upon thee. Many friends try to comfort me; miserable comforters are they all. Thou art the God of consolation; only confirm to me thy precious word, on which thou causedst me to hope in the day when thou saidst to me, "Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive." Only let this life be a spiritual life and I put a blank in thy hand as to all temporal things.

I wait for thy salvation. Amen.

With such a grandmother would you not …

WHAT THE LESSON TEACHES.

They drew nigh unto Jerusalem. One needed hardly to be told that. It could be read in all the air. There was a strange, sensitive alertness everywhere. In the faces of the people at the city gates, in the postures of the pilgrim throngs upon the way, in the varied movements within the city itself. Something, someone, was coming. In the foggy obscurity of a London gathering-place the silent railway thoroughfare begins suddenly to snap and flash, and the people know that the train is just at hand. In the suspense of the early morning upon the wharf there is all at once a mysterious movement in the throng, a sort of awed expectancy everywhere. A halt drops, or an unseen bell rings, and suddenly from out of the gloom the great ship moves in. To waiting Jerusalem at last her King "drew nigh." He was never very far off. Alas! that she knew it not; and when at last he came, in truth, alas, that his own received him not.

Straightway ye shall find. It is the open vision of faith. The church has lost much of this ready eyesight. It gropes about feeling with lame hands and in a sort of spectacled half-blindness. Is it not because the …

The schooner J. B. Newland is being repaired at Racine.

The tug Anspach is receiving a new rail and other wise being fixed up.

Capt. James Spencer, of Racine, has purchased the Kenosha scow Contest.

Charles Sirborn, of Chicago, has bought from J. S. Durham the scow Moses Gage for $1,500 cash.

Capt. Spencer, of Racine, has sold two thirds of the old schooner Adriatic to Capt. A. Anderson and H. Olson for $300.

Advices are to the effect that the ice in the straits of Mackinac is unusually thin for this time of year, and promises to soon break up.

Our old friend Capt. James Gibson, has been re-appointed to the command of the propeller Saginaw Valley, running to Green Bay.

The Cheboygan Tribune says that a new boat named the "Soo City" will be put on the "Soo and Mackinac route" as consort of the "Minnie M." this season.

Capt. J. S. Durham, the Chicago tug and vessel owner, after a trip to the lower lake ports, expresses the conviction that the coming marine season will be a particularly dull one. A similar opinion is accredited to vessel men wherever he has been.

Chicagoans are in a fair way to realize a scheme that has been a pet hobby with them for years, viz: The establishment of extensive docks along the lake front south of the harbor. For this purpose there has been incorporated the Chicago Harbor Improvement Company, by Gen. Chas. Fitz-Simmons, Alexander F. McMillan and F. S. Winston, with a capital of $1,000,000. The intention is to build fourteen piers or docks 300 feet wide, extending 2,000 feet into the lake, and separated by slips or canals 100 feet wide. These piers will occupy the entire frontage, from Randolph Street to Park Row, and extend eastward to the navigation line established by the United States engineers, leaving a water space west of the breakwater pier 1,200 feet wide for the anchorage of vessels. Railway tracks will traverse each of the piers, and they will be used for general commercial purposes. The company proposes to pay the city an agreed price for the privilege asked, with the right to sublet the docks after they have been built for a term of years. Should they fail to effect the proposed lease from the city it is intended to secure the stretch of lake shore north of the mouth of the river.

Don C. Henderson, of the Allegan Journal, has entered upon his 40th consecutive year as a journalist, having begun his newspaper career on the New York Tribune in 1848. "Don" is recognized as a writer of unusual ability and is everywhere regarded as one of the best newspaper men in the State.

Gen. Cutcheon's bill "to provide for the public defense" was considered Friday by the sub-committee and after modification was ordered reported favorably. The bill provides for a government gun factory, at a cost of $750,000, and the contracting for gun steel to the amount of $7,500,000. This latter amount was reduced to $5,000,000.

A prominent citizen of Grand Rapids returned from Ontario and says to a reporter: "There is a strong sentiment in favor of annexation—of peaceable annexation; no one thinks of any other kind. The towns of this region are practically dead. They were once flourishing in the early days before the lumber was all cut away and carried most of it across the lake to the Ohio side. Now they have no manufactures, no trade, no anything. The young men, when they get old enough either go into the larger cities or across the lake to the states. The towns visited are older than Cleveland and Toledo and the other flourishing cities and villages on the Ohio side. And the inhabitants cannot help comparing the condition of their towns with that of these Yankee towns and look with longing eyes across the lake.

OUR GEORGE.

Van Pelt, the Norwood Philosopher [illegible]

If [illegible] and carefully examine the cut herewith, he will discover that it is not, as might be thought, a portrait of a fur manufacturer's dummy or a representation of some survivor of the Jeannette expedition. He will, if he scan the picture closely, discern the well known features of our popular friend, George H. Van Pelt, whose lasts and dies are favorably known to the trade. The picture represents George in full Wolverine costume, as he appears among the natives of Charlevoix, in the wilds of Northern Michigan. Mr. Van Pelt spends about one third of the year in that classic region, which, besides abounding in snow and cold weather, produces a superior article of rock-maple wood from which the excellent stock of lasts furnished to the trade from his factory are manufactured. In addition to this occupation this winter, George has been varying the monotony of his employment by taking part in the passage of a local option law in Charlevoix, and as his name is identified with the successful enterprise it goes without saying that Van Pelt and local option came out at the head of the polls by a large majority. In his confidential report of the result of the election, which took place a couple of weeks ago, he wrote: "Norwood, (my town) went 35 to 1 for no whiskey, and I'm not the one for it. But we had one cuss who wanted to be smart—and the father of a lot of boys, too!" Charlevoix, he tells us, is "a great country for eating and sleeping," and since the abolition of whisky has restored the normal appetite of the natives to its pristine vigor, there will probably be a raise in the price of board in that region. The weather there has only been below zero once or twice this winter, which accounts for Mocassin stockings and buffalo envelope which adorn Mr. Van Pelt in the above portrait, and which he intends to wear to the Republican Convention in Chicago this summer as a means of identification, it selected by the Charlevoix [illegible] as a delegate. Possibly some of our friends who have dealings with Mr. Van Pelt may be inclined to doubt the fact of the absence of the head of the establishment from his headquarters for so long a period of the year as here stated, knowing the regular and punctual business methods of the house. This is explained by the fact that he has an alter ego in the person of Mr. W. J. Fleming, his manager, and whose ability and fidelity enable Mr. Van Pelt to disport himself in his northern fastness and cultivate his appetite in perfect confidence and security that his business gets as faithful and competent attention in his absence as if he were superintending it in person.

Geo. H. Van Pelt was born near Troy, N. Y., May 23, 1841. His father died when he was six months old, and he lost his mother at the age of ten. He lived on a farm till he was fifteen years of age, receiving a good common and high school education. At the age of seventeen he graduated from the Jonesville academy as he says, at the personal request of the principal of the school, and without any elaborate honors. He then entered commercial life as a clerk in a grocery store, and for two years devoted himself to the intricacies of the art of handling soap and codfish. In 1860, at the age of nineteen, he went on the road as a flour salesman, and in 1864 engaged in the flour trade on his own account in Albany, building up one of the largest businesses in the city, and making both success and money. In 1868 he got the Western fever and came to Chicago, engaging as traveling representative for S. H. Ransom & Co., then one of the largest stove manufacturers in the United States, and in this capacity he earned the reputation of being the best man on the road in that line, which, in competion with [illegible] for the quality of his goods, but for business enterprise and integrity. In 18[illegible] he secured the services of Mr. W. J. Fleming, a [illegible] salesman, and [illegible] [illegible] of great [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mr. Van Pelt's [illegible] these qualities [illegible] that proved [illegible] est confidence, [illegible] cially, so far as the business is concerned, as he is termed above, Mr. Van Pelt's other self, so that it is little wonder that the business has grown to be, as it is, the largest of its kind in the United States. Taking Mr. Van Pelt with his personal popularity, his twenty seven years of experience on the road, and his a[illegible] to scoop in the orders, and Mr. Fleming ever vigilant, with a careful, scrutinizing eye to inspect patterns and models before the goods are made and while in process of manufacture, they make a pair for [illegible] hard to beat as they would be down East, where George came from a full team and a red dog under the wagon.

The Railroad Lands.

In the case of the Government and the Michigan railroad lands, Mr. Hughart, President of the G. R. & I. President, has written a letter to the public, in which he says: "I have been informed that the notion has gone abroad that a portion of the land grant of this company is to revert to the United States, and that persons are holding themselves out as authorized to give information, or sell certain rights to would-be purchasers. This is so wholly false and misleading that I think you should give the widest publicity to the denial and explanation. This company holds its lands under patents from the United States and the United States is making no effort to get them back. A suit has been commenced by the State of Michigan, in which it is claimed that a small part of this company's grant should not have been conveyed by the government to the company, for the reason that it was a part of the swamp lands granted the State of Michigan. I suppose more than two thirds of the lands in controversy have been sold, and so far as the balance is concerned they are not for sale now, and may not be offered for some time to come. A decision of the question may not be reached under three or four years. In case the suit should be decided in favor of the State, the lands will not be open for homestead or other entry under United States Laws, but will become a part of the swamp land of the State of Michigan, to be disposed of in accordance with the swamp land laws. No person should either settle upon any of these lands, nor pay out any money, nor make any contract in the hope of securing any rights therein." As to the soundness of this theory, the Attorney General has written President Hughart as follows: "I have read the foregoing letter written by you, and intended for publication. I agree with you that this information should be given, in order that no one need be deceived into settling upon any of the lands in controversy, or paying any money to any person whomsoever on account of the same. I also agree with you that these lands can never be opened for homestead or other settlement under United States laws. But that in case the State should in the end be successful, they will be held to be a part of the swamp lands of the State. I cheerfully join in this, so that no innocent person may be misled."

Our neighbor, the Journal, advocates prohibiting the running at large of cows in Charlevoix township hereafter. We think our brother is led into an error by not being the possessor of a cow, and commits an unkindness to those poor unfortunates who are. Charlevoix is peculiarly situated on this cow question. There is not, within reasonable distance from the village, sufficient pasturage to accommodate the village cows, nor one-half of them. The result of such prohibition will be that many who now keep cows, and who derive great benefit from them, will be compelled to dispose of them. The effect will be a hardship to many and we hope that those who have no interest in cows will not be intolerant to those who have.

Mr. W. P. Brown has received, as a gift from Rev. Dr. Jones, of Kalamazoo, the plans and specifications of the Episcopal chapel to be erected by Christ Church Mission, in this village. The work was done by Roberts, well known here, and represents in detail a beautiful gothic structure, complete in all interior arrangement, with a seating capacity of 120, besides chancel and choir space, and designed with a view to enlargement at such future time as the Mission shall find it inadequate to their wants. Though small in the beginning, it will be a beautiful and convenient place of worship. The south end, behind the altar, is designed to receive a memorial window in memory of Mr. Brown's deceased daughter. With a completed house of worship, Charlevoix Mission will, during the summer months be happily situated—the summer cottage of Right Rev.
